VITALIZED PHOSPHITES.—Restores the energy lost by nervousness, weakness or indigestion; relieves lassitude and neuralgia; refreshes the nerves tired by worry, excitement or excessive sensitiveness, and strengthens a failing memory. It aids wonderfully in the mental and bodily growth of infants and children. Under its use the teeth come easier, the bones grow better, the skin smoother, the brain acquires more readily and rests and sleeps more sweetly. An ill fed brain learns no lessons, and is excusable if peevish. It gives a more intellectual and happier childhood. It does away with that feeling of weakness and exhaustion which impels to the use of alcoholic beverages, and directly counteracts a cause of depravity and suffering which has baffled the efforts of religion and morality. Not a secret remedy; formula on every label. For sale by Druggists, or mail, $1.

Miscellaneous Selections.

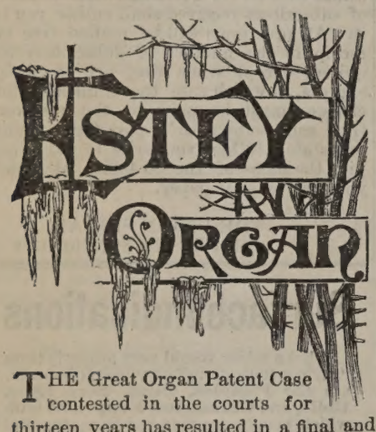
The brewers and liquor dealers of New York city, at a large meeting, unanimously voted not to employ any man who was not a voter, and not to vote for any man on their party ticket who favored prohibition in the slightest degree. Whisky, you see, is in politics.

Wherever the question has come before the people this year the result has been in almost every instance a declaration has been made that the grog shops must go. There can be no clearer indication of the signs of the times.

The liquor dealers of Osage county, Kansas, adopted the following: "Resolved, that we, the saloon keepers of the Osage county Saloon Keepers' Union, will close our places of business on and after the 26th day of December, and will not sell any intoxicating drinks whatever under the present prohibitory law.



THE Great Organ Patent Case contested in the courts for thirteen years has resulted in a final and complete overthrow for the opponents of the Estey Organ.

The well earned leading position of the Esteys, after years of effort, is not easily set aside by the cheap imitators of a day.

The intelligent musical public everywhere will help a decision as to the value of the Estey Organs, and an Illustrated Catalogue, sent free by the manufacturers to any address, will suggest many pleasing styles.

Signal Notes.

THE Duke of Westminster, an immense property owner of London, allows no intoxicating liquor to be sold in any building on any land rented from him. Such deeds half reconcile us to some owning vast estates, and almost to titles of monarchical government.

A LITTLE GIRL in the city of Washington, thirteen years old, is so enslaved by her appetite for beer that they cannot trust her on the street alone.

THE alumni of the Philadelphia College of Pharmacy have condemned "the sale of intoxicating liquors as a beverage in drug-storef as a growing evil tending to degrade the profession of pharmacy, and damage the morals of the community."

Worth Thinking Of.

What Ayer's Cherry Pectoral does:—

It prevents the growth, to serious illness, of a dangerous class of diseases that begin as mere trivial ailments, and are too apt to be neglected as such.
It alleviates even the most desperate cases of pulmonary diseases, and affords to the patient a last and the only chance for restoration to health.
It breaks up a cold, and stops a cough more speedily, certainly, and thoroughly than any other medicine.
It spares mothers much painful anxiety about their children, and saves the little ones' lives.
It cures all lung and throat diseases that can be reached by human aid.

How Ayer's Cherry Pectoral Does Such Good.

It expels the mucus from the throat and the air passages of the head, and cleanses the mucous membrane.
It allays inflammation, puts a stop to tickling in the throat and coughing, and enables the patient to rest.
It heals sore throat, reduces the swollen tonsils, and restores natural tone to the affected vocal cords.
It soothes to natural and refreshing slumber, during which Nature regains strength to combat disease.
It clears out and heals diseased air cells in the lungs, and helps Nature to repair the waste made by the corrosion of pulmonary disease.
It puts a stop to the cankerous decay of Catarrh.

Why Ayer's Cherry Pectoral is so Per[illegible] Medicine.

Public Library Boylston st 20285

Because it is a scientifically ordered compound, of great potency, the product of years of study, observation, and experience in the treatment of throat and lung diseases.
Because it is prepared from the purest forms of the drugs employed in it, chemically combined by a process of such perfection and accuracy as would be unattainable, even by the most skillful pharmacist, dealing with small quantities.
Because it is [illegible]tive medicine for the [illegible] designed, but, owing to [illegible] quantities in which it is made, is [illegible] so low a price that it is placed within the reach of every household.
Because it is an active curative agent, that must be taken by drops, as prescribed in the directions accompanying each bottle, and not a mere palliative syrup that may be swallowed by mouthfuls.

Where Ayer's Cherry Pectoral Stands Before the World.

It is popularly known to be a medicine that has cured laryngeal, bronchial, and pulmonary affections where all others had failed.
It is a favorite household remedy to-day with people whose lives were saved by it, when they were young, a generation ago.
It has held the first-place in popular estimation for nearly half a century in this country, and is more and more highly appreciated, year after year, both at home and abroad.
It evokes daily, from all over the world, expressions of gratitude for lives saved by its use.
It is everywhere recommended by reputable druggists, who know, from conversations with their patrons, and from their own experience, how almost magical are its effects for good.
It is regularly prescribed by many physicians of the best standing, and is recommended by Professors of Medical Colleges, to their students, as invaluable for all diseases of the throat and lungs.

The Union Signal

OFFICIAL ORGAN OF THE WOMAN'S NATIONAL CHRISTIAN TEMPERANCE UNION.

"Thou hast given a banner to them that fear Thee; that it may be displayed because of the Truth; that Thy beloved may be delivered."

VOL. X.—NO. 11. CHICAGO, MARCH 13, 1884. $1 75 PER YEAR.

DR. B. W. RICHARDSON the eminent scientist, in addressing a recent meeting in London, said that "the temperance cause will never win its way, until all the women in the kingdom, and throughout the civilized world are embarked in the enterprise of temperance."

THE committee on philanthropy of the Illinois Social Science Association invite the public and especially all temperance people, to its regular meeting, Saturday May 15, 2:30, p. m., to participate in a discussion of the theme "The temperance reform, the great philanthropy of the age."

THE Manchester (Eng.) Band of Hope union recently sent a memorial to the board of education asking the adoption of a system of temperance school readers in the city schools. It was found on investigation, that with one exception all the books were at present in use in the board schools.

REV. DAWSON BURNS of the United Kingdom Temperance Alliance gives to America the credit of the first temperance organization. This was the American temperance society, organized in Park street church, Boston, February 13, 1826. This he says, was where the modern temperance movement was born.

THE English are evidently turning their dinner glasses upside down. The decrease in sherry drinking is very remarkable. Statistics show that the difference in this respect between 1883 and ten years ago is not less than 2,776,144 gallons. And as to spirits a decrease in all kinds amounting to over two million gallons, appears.

THE wary traveler can no longer drink "the wine of the country" in Paris for fear of the evil effects of water. In the last report of the Paris Municipal Laboratory, under whose chemical scrutiny the wines of city trade must pass, the number of good wines found in an analysis of 3,361 samples was only 357, while 1,093 were "passable," 1,709 were bad, and 202 positively dangerous.

A BOY murderer suffered the extreme penalty of the law, in Ohio not long since. As he stood upon the scaffold, his pitiful appeal to the men of Ohio was this: "That rope means first a glass of poisoned lemonade, at last a bottle of rum, and over in that saloon now filled with boys and men, my ruin was wrought. Oh! let me implore you with my dying breath, close the saloons as you love your boys; close them for their protection!"

ANOTHER new song is on our lips. Its notes are all of praise and thanksgiving. On Thursday last, too late for the issue of last week came the following telegram from Albany New York.

GOD HAS CROWNED THE MONTHS OF PRAYER AND ALMOST SUPERHUMAN LABOR WITH VICTORY. THE NEW YORK LEGISLATURE TODAY CAST THE FINAL VOTE FOR A STRONG COMPULSORY TEMPERANCE EDUCATION LAW. MARY H. HUNT.

The great Empire state with its million of children in the public schools evidently means to maintain its imperial prestige and character. No more royal road to empire has ever been "cast up" than that which embeds itself on the rock of intelligent morals.

IT is reported by one "on the spot" that when the bill had reached its third reading, all antagonism to it had like Bob Acres' courage "oozed out," and on the final vote, just two persons committed themselves against it. Only one man was left to say in the blandest and the blindest of political moods, "If this measure applied to Sunday schools, instead of public schools, it would be admissable."

The union of church and state seems not to frighten this astute politician half so much as the prospect of "temperance in politics."

THE first insurance company founded on a total abstinence basis, came into being because a total abstainer was refused a policy in one of the old established companies, simply because he was a total abstainer, and his life chances decreased in consequence. This was Robert Warren who became one of the founders of the company which has within the past few years declared such fine dividends in the total abstainer's section. Now the same old company makes a "surcharge" of ten per cent on the lives of men in any way connected with the liquor traffic.

HERE is a hint for some of our tall colleges for women. The girls of Girton College at Cambridge, having been warned by an alarm of fire, providentially averted, have formed themselves into a Fire Brigade, and for perfection of drill and rapidity of maneuver have drawn out warm commendations from the regular fire captains. If such exercises were practiced in our crowded educational buildings where young ladies "most do congregate," we should not hear often of such terrible holocausts as that of Belleville.

TORONTO has bestirred itself to undo the licensing of grocers to sell liquors. A large popular vote condemned the practice, and the city council has passed an ordinance forbidding the sale of liquors in connection with family supplies. The grocer is already, as says an English exchange, a tobacconist, fruiterer, cheesemonger and provision merchant. Why should he seek to be spirit merchant also? Rather, the more legitimate question would be, why should the people sanction the sale of liquors at places which women and children most do frequent?

MOTHERS look out for the dime novels. No poison more insidious could be introduced in your homes. Keep the mind's health as carefully protected as you do the body's, and the State Reform School will not open its doors to close them for years upon one of your darlings. A mother's boy in Montreal, only fourteen years old, was recently detected in a $300 forgery. He and two companions were about starting for New York, and had thirty dime novels in their possession. A boy in the Thaddeus Stevens public school at Philadelphia, when reprimanded by his teacher on Wednesday, drew a revolver and threatened to shoot her. This led to a search of the pupils, when seven revolvers were captured from boys about ten years old. About one hundred and twenty dime novels were discovered to be the property of the youthful scapegraces.

THE conductor of a suburban train said the other day as the cars halted at a way station. "I always step out to the artesian well here and drink two glasses of the pure water." Some of the men standing about the station began to chaff him on the "thinness" of the beverage. "Well," said he, "It'll never land me in the gutter."

It is said that the New York city car drivers are taking to water as the most steadily stimulating drink. One of them entertained a passenger not long since with the following:

"I've tried liquor and I've tried cold water, and I must say that cold water takes the cake everytime. I used to be what you might call a hard drinker, but I've turned over a new leaf. The first thing I do in the morning is to take a good big drink of cold water. It serves as my eye opener. While I'm on the car I get a drink at the end of the route. I don't know how to explain it, but it keeps me as warm as toast all day long. Some of the men drink hot tea or lemonade. The men who prefer whisky are the men who complain most of the cold every time."

ONE SEED.

MRS. EMMA L. S. PUFFER.

It chanced—upon a certain time,
A traveller, in an Eastern clime,
Whirling away an idle hour,
Roaming the woods—espied a flower!
So strangely beautiful, he gathered, pressed with care,
To study with more time, its beauty rare.

Returning homeward to his native land,
The book was opened by a careless hand.
The flower—crushed—was thrown away.
Lost was it? Wait! One springtime day
A tiny leaflet peeped above the ground.
The coming days, another and another found.

Warm winds, sun, rain, and dew,
Nourished the plant, until it grew
Its natural size: to buds gave birth;
And from the buds, fair, glorious blooms, burst forth.
Again the traveller idly passing by;
Delighted, the strange flower again does spy!
Gazes bewildered; "It is but a dream I fear
How is it possible, the plant is here?"

He did not know a seed lodged in the book,
With the crushed flower, fell in this sunny nook,
Took heart, and sunward groped and pushed its way
Grew stronger, taller each returning day.
Unwavering, steadfast, it performed its duty,
Until a sturdy plant grew, robed in wondrous beauty.

Of trusting perseverance, a memorial odorous:
A cheering symbol to weak hearts, and dolorous.
With every bloom the seed was multiplied,
Gathered, and scattered far and wide;
Till over all the world its mates were sown;
The plant, admired and loved wherever known.

Let us, who 'gainst intemperance strive to cope,
A lesson learn from this of faith and hope.
Though we be few, and met with scorn and sneer,
Keep we our lights a-burning, bright and clear.
A constant dropping wears and clefts a stone,
A constant warfare, will King Alcohol dethrone.

Be not discouraged! Take for guide, the seed.
Remembering this! The greater is the need
Of work, the stronger must we work;
Leave not a cranny where the curse may lurk.

E'en though our eyes may not behold the day,
That sees intemperance lose its wretched sway.
Stand firm! Let us not weary be
In doing well. Some will the reaping see.
Let us faint not! but work hand clasped in hand.
"For God, and home, and native land!"

TEMPERANCE EDUCATION.

BY SARAH A. McCLEES.

Different theories of education have always prevailed. No one, however, has disputed the right and province of the old and experienced to give instruction to young and immature minds. The history of education through all the ages reveals one interesting fact:—that, in the conflict of words upon methods, the universal idea has been a training in the principles of a virtuous life.

Through the dim vistas of the past, we have glimpses into remote antiquity, and see the prototype of our great free school system in a group of little children gathered about an old man, seated on a high place in the little village, to hear words of wisdom from his lips. Contrast this little torch light with the effulgent radiance of our day, when ten million pupils sit at the feet of 270,000 teachers in our public schools!

Let us keep the thought before our minds which we have stated to be a universal axiom, that the meaning of education is a training in virtue. This definition has been accepted by good men always and everpwhere—call then by what name you will.

The Persians were fire worshipers, yet one of their wise men, says on this subject, "Most states allow every citizen to educate his sons as he pleases, and then suffer the more advanced youth to shape their conduct according to their inclinations; and, after that, command them not to steal, not to disobey the magistrates, etc. If a man then offend, they visit him with punishment. The Persian laws, on the other hand, anticipate and take care, from the very outset, the citizens be not such as to incline to any evil or disgraceful deed." In that early period of the Christian era, four grades attended school for the express purpose of learning justice.

The historian further says, that in order to teach the small pupils to be temperate in eating and drinking they were instructed to bring for their lunch from home, only bread and cresses and a goblet to drink water from the river. When older, sixteen or seventeen, they must still preserve the habit of self government. If any one complained of his meagre fare, he was asked to remember how sweet bread and broth and water were to him who had an appetite.

It is worthy of our special notice, that the Persians educated for citizenship. They recognized their boys as members of society. In this day we recognize boys and girls as members of society.

What we are accustomed to call advanced ideas of a virtuous life, nurtured and fostered by rigid self government and daily habits of abstemiousness in diet, and obedience to proper authority, we find exemplified amongst the Greeks to a remarkable degree.

Homer's ideal heroes were not only men of refinement and culture, but self governed, discreet, moderate,—such as we style "nature's noblemen." We might well substitute our own Garfield for his Ulysses. Could we place either of these characters on such a high plane of well rounded perfection of attributes, if education embraced merely the training of mental powers?

The veriest tyro in learning, our little boy spouter on the stage, knows that Sparta made its boys strong for future duty to the state as soldiers, by bodily exercise and discipline. We would not have the mothers of America imitate the Spartans and give up the puny, delicate infant at its birth to the state authorities to perish in a mountainous chasm, or have our public officials inspect the little one and order it cared for if healthy and vigorous, but, they may take a lesson from the teaching of Pythagoras—that excellence of character depends much upon early physical habits. He forbade all luxurious living to his pupils; they were allowed little meat and no wine; for, even in that little republic so resplendent with bright examples of pure living, Plato mourns over the decrease of moral virtue. Listen to his lamentations, the refrain of which has now swelled into a loud chorus from the lips of our women in Christian Temperance Unions all over the land. "Our children are spoiled and petted; wine is given to them; they have shoes, gay dresses, warm beds," etc. We temperance women protest against the spread of luxurious customs which are corrupting rich and poor now as then. Such exemplary citizens of the Grecian Republic as Themistocles, Aristides, Pericles, Thucydides, Socrates could not save their sons from the prevailing vices of the times. In the rapid increase of wealth, even boys gave themselves up to drunkenness, and Greece fell! Other reasons besides self-indulgence precipitated the ruin of that beautiful free state—reasons which we cannot fail to see are weighty in our own free America, and tending to the same end: notably, the strife between political parties, who regarded partisan interests as of more consequence than the safety of the state. Therefore in view of the perils to which our nation is exposed is it not the duty of the mothers of this Republic, upon whom the earliest instruction of the future citizen of the commonwealth rests, to give the boys and girls specific training in the art of governing, first themselves, then others. Teach them "to do justice and love mercy"?

Ascending the scale from the inner world of selfdom, and the broader domain of faculties trained for conquest in the social relations with the family, the church and state, there is a process of instruction known in these days as the "higher education," its intent being a training of the moral powers, as distinct from the physical and mental. I wish this separation of the three-foldnature of our being were not made. For underlying the whole system of education, and without which it is imposible to develop a self-governing being, able to control himself and walk wisely toward his brother man, is the religious principle of the fear of God. This principle, indeed, forms neither the substratum nor the cap-stone of the noble structure, "made in the image of God," and designed when perfect and complete to be a temple for His indwelling, but is the sum and substance, the soul of the entire fabric.

"To give children a good education," says Dr. Noah Webster, "in manners, arts and science is important, to give them a religious education is indispensable; and," he adds, "an immense responsibility rests on parents and guardians who neglect these duties." In this comprehensive fashion he defines the word education, "as including all that series of instruction and discipline which is intended to enlighten the understanding, correct the temper, and form the manners and habits of youth, and fit them for usefulness in their future stations."

With the general acceptation of the correctness of this definition it is a pertinent inquiry whether parents and guardians of our youth are fulfilling their obligations? Objectors to the introduction of certain studies into the public schools relating to effects of stimulants and narcotics upon the human system, are quick to recognize the duty of home teaching upon these and kindred subjects, implying that it should rest with mother to say what the child shall eat and drink! a pitiable sarcasm, unworthy of notice, because it shows the narrow conceptions of some, who cannot comprehend the magnitude of the temperance question, and its relationship to the social and political interests of the nation.

The reason assigned by some parents for declining to sign the petitions which have been in circulation for the legislature to enact laws requiring the introduction of such studies, that their children have too many studies already, is far more plausible. An argument it is which deserves to be treated with respect, and a satisfactory answer given to honest and conscientious fathers and mothers who want thoroughness developed in their children. They should exercise their privileges as independent citizens, more than equally interested with the teachers, and protest and petition against the pursuit of certain kinds of knowledge for their boys and girls, and in favor of such other instruction as they think will best "fit for usefulness in their future stations."

"Mr." Gail Hamilton, so recently dubbed by an English critic, who does not understand that a woman could write with such vigor of style, nor that one of our sex would dare assail so boldly, and with such courage of conviction, a national system of public instruction. Our sharp tongued sister says what she thinks the children of the republic should not be taught, for, like many other merciless critics, she deals in negatives, and finds it easier to pull down than build up, yet her idea of exalting the teacher and subordinating the system is good, and notwithstanding her keenness of satire, naturally offensive to men who hold all the power as boards, commissioners, and superintendents and committees, she utters some grand truths when she says that the aim of the schools is not to make scholars or mere grammarians, but intelligent and valuable citizens of a republic. It is desirable that as carpenters, farmers, cooks, sempstresses, etc., they be able to keep their own accounts, read understandingly, to vote intelligently, to pass judgment upon affairs, to see that the "republic receive no detriment."

I cannot forbear quoting a few more paragraphs, because the views are in accord with our notions of temperance education.

"A girl ought to be taught geography and arithmetic in so thorough and conscientious fashion that it shall stand her in good stead whenever she sweeps the stairs, and lead her to "sweep out the corners, and when she dusts the table, to dust under the books, and when she sews to sew finely and firmly, or coarsely and slightly, as the task demands."

"A boy should be taught so to master his lessons as to form in him the habit of being on time for all his life long, and make him hold his occupations staunchly in hand, and always to keep his word. Children can learn very little science in their short school life, but the one thing they should learn is mastery."

This training of boys and girls in virtuous principles was considered of so much consequence by the founders of the public school system in Massachusetts, that the idea was thus incorporated in their statutes: "It shall be the duty of all public instructors of youth to impress on the minds of children committed to their care the principles of piety and justice, and a sacred regard for truth, love of their country, humanity, and universal benevolence, sobriety, industry and frugality, chastity, moderation and temperance, and those other virtues which are the ornament of society, and the basis upon which a republican government is founded."

Thus it is seen from the records of the past, that men of wisdom, of different nations and creeds, have decided that education is incomplete when it embraced less than the development of the three-fold nature, the physical, the mental, the moral. Of late years the facts of science have been gaining prominence in our schools, and those sciences especially which relate to life and health are being placed in the curriculum of studies. This is in keeping with the spirit of the age, which in some places has not only demanded but secured the introduction of manual training. Some advocate the use of tools because boys have to earn their own living. The Winthrop school for girls teaches them to cut and make clothing. Lasell Seminary teaches dress-making. And now, our Woman's Christian Temperance Union comes to the front, and asks that the nature and effects of intoxicating beverages, stimulants and narcotics upon the human system may be taught. So reasonable has the request seemed to our legislators in the states where the effort has been made that laws requiring the study have been placed upon the statute books, in New Hampshire, Vermont and Michigan. Our educators should not object, even the advocates of indulgence in the so called "healthy malt liquors," should not be unwilling to have our boys and girls taught what distilled liquors contain; and what the action of brandy, whisky, rum and gin is upon the human system regarded in their physical effects merely. Intelligence is needful, in order that the coming generation may be able to form their own judgments from the knowlege of scientific facts. It must be remembered, that, by this method we are not making an appeal for pledge-taking, we are not asking for prohibition of the liquor traffic, we are only saying what every citizen has a right to say, Let my children have the light which has been diffused on this subject within the last decade. As parents, we ask that our children may have teachers who know what we mothers know of the evil effects of intoxicants and narcotics so that the school instruction may be in harmony with home instruction.

"Healthy malt liquors" is the cry of a large class of respectable drinking people many of whom are honest in their belief that the moderate use of ales and beers is productive of good and not evil. Not long since, when Senator Frye of the state of Maine proposed in congress to prohibit the sale of spirtuous and malt liquors within the capitol building the motion was objected to by another senator, upon the ground that malt liquors were wholesome. Finally the bill was passed by the alteration of phraseology into "intoxicating liquors."

Now, had the learned gentleman been instructed in in this department of modern science, he would have known that this "wholesome fermented beverage," contains the intoxicating principle, although not in as large porportion as the distilled liquors. Had he known too, what every temperance worker knows by actual observation and experience, of the many cases of drunkenness resulting from indulgence in these so-called lighter beverages, he would not have been foiled in his political acumen.

The comprehensive nature of education as embraced in the National W. C. T. U. is evident, not only in the department I have emphasized, known as scientific instruction, but also in its departments of heredity and hygiene. Herbert Spencer says, "We now respect the mind and ignore the body." "There should be a diffusion of the belief that the preservation of health is a duty." "All breaches of the laws of health are physical sins." The sort of morality embraced in these terse aphorisms, is not only heartily endorsed but practically recognized in our broad system.

The subject of heredity as treated by our national superintendent is, as a distinguished physician says, "An advance that promises a world of new thought, a field of the grandest possibilities." She lays out a plan of study which will include a knowledge of past ages in architecture, forms of government, religious customs and household life, all this being essential in our judgment of the men and women of today, and to a proper understanding of hereditary tendencies.

Of course it would be impossible within the limits of this paper, to enlarge upon the many branches grafted upon our temperance tree, which has struck its roots so deep in the soil of our nation's domain and destiny.

Look, for instance, at the stalwart "legal" branch "fostering" laws against the liquor traffic at once just and humane; at the "franchise" branch, which when we leave its ample shade, refusing instruction and protection, will leave us still the victims of political disability. See the branches interlacing each other to take the children under their kindly care—in Sunday schools, and week day schools, in kindergartens and kitchen gardens; see, the budding "Flowers" and bursting leaves of kindly benevolent missions to sick and poor and friendless and sinful; in almshouses, station houses, police stations, jails, and prisons and hospitals; in ships and forts and barracks; amongst the colored people and Indians and foreigners.

These leaves of the tree of life for the healing of the nations, are multiplying in "temperance literature," which now, in the beginning of this second decade of the great reform, demands and claims respect from educated and scholarly men and women of two continents.

Is all this wonderful activity of social forces a purely humanitarian impulse? What is the spirit that moves this mighty organization? At a state teacher's convention held in Yonkers last year, Prof. Felix Adler, in advocating the claims of certain industrial studies for primary classes of children, was asked by one of the audience, what he would answer a child who inquired if there was a God? When he replied that he would refer the child to his parents or his priest, loud applause followed from many women in the audience, who, by that act, indicated their disapprobation of religious instruction in schools, It was also a tacit assent to Rousseau's advice, "For God's sake, let the rising generation not hear a word about God!"

Grateful indeed should we be, that this is not the spirit actuating the women of our temperance unions. God forbid! for is not our success due to the recognition of the Christ power to reform, regenerate, renew the life? And the same divine energy is needed in the preventive agencies employed to train the young for virtue and immortality.

SHORT TEMPERANCE TALKS. NO. II.

BY MISS C. S. BURNETT.

No. 2.—Some of the mistakes you make.

By you I mean the very large class of highly respectable people who claim to be temperance men and women and yet are not prohibitionists. You were well pleased with "The Mistakes We Make," and frequently said, "That's so," while reading it. Be just as candid now and you will see that there is at least a mote in your own eyes.

First, you make a mistake when you call prohibitionists "fanatics," intending thereby to bring reproach upon them and the cause. Do you not know that "each age builds monuments to the fanatics of the preceding?" Fanaticism is not of modern origin. Paul was a fanatic worthy of imitation. Wilberforce was a fanatic, and so were Garrison and Greeley and Lincoln and a host of others who were in earnest over the extermination of a crime not so great as that which we are fighting. If Gov. St. John, Neal Dow, Miss Willard, and their host of followers are fanatics we will only say, "I would that you were not only almost but altogether such as they." You make a mistake in thinking the prohibitionists ought to abandon their party and vote for such men and measures as seem best calculated to promote the cause of temperance. The very insignificant "third party" of fifty years ago freed the slaves by closely adhering to principle until the "splendid minority" saw their principles inculcated in the platform of the great republican party, and the minority was merged in the majority, and the right conquered and oppression ended. The temperance people will gladly give up their organization just as soon as the "great reform party" will insert a plank in its platform pledging the party to constitutional prohibition of the liquor traffic. We say "This one thing I do," and that one thing with whatever party that expects to receive the vote of the religious element of our country much longer must be prohibition of all that can intoxicate. The day of moral suasion alone is past.

My honest voter, you make a mistake when you suppose that the cause of temperance can be promoted and the liquor traffic suppressed, or even restrained, by license. Our country has had license two hundred years, and with what result? The increase of intemperance and the consequent vice plainly tell us. The license system justly assumes that the traffic is wrong and must be controlled. The objection to the system is that it does not control the trade. It does not limit the sale of liquor. It helps to make this systematized crime respectable. It involves the right to license other vices. I never could understand, though I have given much thought to the subject, how the putting a thing that is wrong on the statute book makes it right. The licensing of crime is itself a crime; and licensing saloons by the voter makes every such voter a partner in the saloon business and a guilty accessory of crimes resulting from the traffic.

License is partial prohibition. If liquor selling is right make it free to all; if wrong prohibit it. No other course is reasonable. My brother, do not again make the mistake of voting for license.

A CARD FROM MISS WILLARD.

Dear Sisters of the W. C. T. U.:

My ten years "on the road" will soon expire, and, after careful consideration, it seems to me that I can best serve our cause, for awhile at least, by working from the center rather than the circumference. Since the new year, I have done more writing and planning for our National Union than ever before in the same length of time, and I hope to better purpose. Arrangements have been matured for sending out organizers and there is hardly a state that is not now being invaded. The W. C. T. U. is multiplying its auxiliaries as never before in its history and the response of good and intelligent women is more spontaneous and hearty. In this work of extending the society and developing the departments as well as writing for the press, I can serve our cause to much better purpose than would have been possible before I traveled through all the forty-eight states and territories, thus securing an immense number of choice correspondents and coadjutors.

My dear mother very soon completes the first quarter of her eightieth year, and after her long and patient waiting it is no wonder that she begins to urge upon me the duty (as well as pleasure) of relinquishing, for the present, my peripatetic method and making pen rather than voice the instrument of my work for the W. C. T. U. In the propriety of this view of the case I think my temperance friends will acquiesce. My apology for this personal explanation is that the requests for work coming from various states can not be generally complied with under this "new departure," and I feel that my sisters of the state and local unions should have a full understanding of the reason.

In Massachusetts, Indiana, and Wisconsin, I still have "outstanding claims" which I shall try to meet as speedily as possible, and there are about fifty "special" towns which I have never visited, scattered through a dozen or more states, where I mean to do some work before the St. Louis convention. I have also agreed to go to Chautauqua and a few other summer meetings and shall attend several of the state conventions. But the general plan here outlined will be adhered to for the reasons stated.

With earnest thanks to those whose letters of invitation I would be glad to answer favorably, and with unchanged devotion to and activity in our blessed cause, I am, your affectionate sister,

FRANCES E. WILLARD.

THE FLORIDA CONVENTION.

Dear Union Signal:—The Florida Convention is over; and a grand good time we had. Our dear Mrs. Smith, who has been threatening us with a visit all the winter, has come at last, and was with us. You know what that means. The convention was held at Jacksonville, which is always crowded with Northerners at this season of the year. I do not know how many "original Crusaders" attended our meetings, but there were quite a number. The Presbyterian, Baptist, Northern and Southern Methodist churches were all placed our at disposal, and each of them occupied during the convention.

Florida has shot away ahead during the last few months and the other southern states had better look to their laurels or she will win them. I am amazed at the showing. I send you the following newspaper account of their juvenile work. It was worth coming to Jacksonville to see Miss Tucker's Brigade and Mrs. Goodyear's Bands:

In the afternoon the order of business was interrupted by the appearance on the scene of a youthful temperance army. The Bands of Hope of Jacksonville and its suburbs, and the young temperance people generally, met at 3:30 o'clock at the Jacksonville grammar school and marched to the Library Hall, with a banner bearing the inscription, "Jacksonville Bands of Hope," at the head of the procession. There were fully two hundred and fifty bright, neatly dressed boys and girls in the line, and presented a spectacle to impress the thoughtful as they passed through the streets. On arriving at Library Hall they were introduced by Mrs. Chapin, chairman, to the W. C. T. U. as our future voters, presidents, congressmen and governors and their wives. The union responded with the Chautauqua salute. The children sang, and in response to Mrs. Chapin's question, "Boys, does license pay?" one of them, Master Willie Archibald, responded with an oration proving that license does not pay. Mrs. Chapin then addressed the children in her easy inimitable style, and the breathless attention which she received from them proved it to be also impressive. The children were dismissed after a happy afternoon.

Hon. Mr. Stearns of New York, Rev. Mr. Mead, Mr. Thrower, of Atlanta, Dr. and Mrs. Leavitt, and a number of other distinguished visitors took part in our meetings.

The officers elected for the following year are an assurance that a grand temperance work is going to be done by the W. C. T. U. of Florida. Mrs. Walter Guyon, of Jacksonville, Mrs. Col. Summerfield Gray, of Ocala, Mrs. Dr. Alexander, of St. Augustine and Miss Lou Tucker, daughter of Judge Wofford Tucker, are all South Carolinians, and ladies whose services and influence the old Palmetto state can illy spare.

Mrs. J. L. Lyons, the president, is the wife of a Presbyterian minister, a missionary for many years to Syria. She brings into the temperance work the consecration that made her willing to go upon a foreign mission, and with ex-Gov. Read's wife and Mrs. Gen. Finley, the vice president, I predict a glorious showing from the land of flowers, which will be represented at the next National.

I am at St. Augustine, Mrs. Smith at Tallahassee. We meet again in New Orleans on the 6th. We are trying to cover all the ground we can. I spoke five times on Sunday. My visit to St. Augustine has filled my heart with joy. I spoke last night in the Presbyterian church, and was introduced by the venerable rector of St. Paul's Episcopal church, Dr. Roote. The church was crowded, many not being able to get seats and a great many standing during the entire services. The officers of the St. Augustine Union met me at the depot with carriage and horses and we spent the morning sight-seeing. Every thing in the place is worth seeing. All is quaint, old, and like no other place.

The streets are most of them too narrow for vehicles to pass each other. Treasury street is only seven feet wide; you can easily shake hands across it.

The old Spanish cathedral, built in 1793, with its Moorish belfry is the first object of interest to travelers. We saw in it a painting of "the landing of the Spanish, and their first mass," said to have been painted in 1565. Near the altar was a unique lamp of solid silver, in which has been kept burning the sacred flame for nearly one hundred years without interruption. The old residences, the fort and the city gates are all built of coquina. This is a conglomeration of sand and shells, and is not manufactured. The coquina quarries, from which the coquina is taken, are very near the city. But I have not time to tell you of the wonderful sights in this wonderful old place, older by forty years than any other in the United States. From the time we drove through those picturesque city gates until we left, we were entertained, interested and delighted. It is to the northern tourists in winter what Newport is to them in summer. The young folks were everywhere. Some of the more sentimental were promenading on the sea wall, which extends from the Old Fort to the United States Barracks, one mile away. Others were playing lawn tennis in the court of the Old Fort; others riding horseback, driving, sailing, strolling through the beautiful orange groves. Two of the very finest are right in the city. Dr. Anderson has over fifteen hundred trees and to our northern visitors it is a source of great delight to see the trees laden with the golden fruit and filled with the fragrant orange blossoms at the same time. The rose gardens of St. Augustine are also very attractive. One rose bush is fifteen feet high, and twenty-one inches in circumference.

The finest light-house on the Atlantic coast is within sight. It cost over $100,000; the lantern alone cost $16,000. Fort Marion, with its gloomy, dismal dungeon, in which were found the skeletons of some poor tortured creatures, supposed to be Huguenots, had a horrible interest to me. But I must stop, and not before I speak of our grand temperance hotel, kept by Mr. Adkins. It is the best hotel in St. Augustine. The best class of people are here, the table, the waiters, the host, are not excelled in the country. As soon as my appointment was announced Mr. A. requested "the privilege of entertaining me," and the very best accommodations the hotel afforded were mine. My host and his lovely daughter put all other engagements aside and heard my talk. Remember the Florida House, a strictly temperance hotel. It is long past midnight, so adieu. S. F. Chapin.

OUR FLOWER MINISTRY.

Dear Union Signal:—The dreadful flood in this region and the suffering attendant upon it has thrown so much work in my hands that I have been prevented from writing to those interested in the flower mission branch of the W. C. T. U. as I had hoped to do several weeks ago. The time is almost at hand when we must begin our work in real earnest, and I want to reach all the state superintendents and all others interested in the "ministry of flowers" through your columns. You will remember that last fall I had a letter in The Union Signal explanatory of the beautiful aim of the flower mission, and how it is to be organized, and what may be its outgrowth.

I can see no way in which the whole plan of work can be brought out more clearly, and so I have determined to send copies to each state superintendent to be distributed by her to her local presidents. In order to be able to know the needs of those who will labor with us I want to suggest that each superintendent will send questions about anything she does not understand to The Union Signal and I will be glad to answer such queries as clearly and concisely as possible. To this end it would be well for the superintendents to find from their local officers what information is wanted. The field is so large, my stock of strength so small (and no one to assist me at all), I can think of no better way to meet the demands for information. From some of the postals I have received I fear the impression is abroad that we only desire to organize missions for prison day work. That is but a small part of our labors, only one day's efforts. Our one aim is to lead souls to Christ, and in so doing we lead them up to temperance. It is the soul side and must have at its head godly consecrated women. I will issue a circular about the middle of April in regard to prison day, which is the 9th of June.

I have written to Miss Colman of our literature department to ask if she can furnish the flower missions with text cards at as reasonable rates as they can be bought at other places. I will have her answer published in The Union Signal. It seems wise for each state superintendent to get her cards here as that will keep our money in our own work. For weekly needs we must use only the plain cards as the floral texts would be too expensive for general work, but for prison day the literature department will furnish suitably embellished text cards.

CONNECTI-CUTTINGS.

Dear Union Signal:—In reading reports from many fields, I rarely see an item from Conn., no Connecticut. (I am bound to obey those hints from the editor.) Now, since we have no state organ, and no means of knowing what is transpiring with our unions unless we find it in your columns, I am afraid we shall forget ourselves unless we fill our niche.

Though a comparative stranger in the state, I can at least send some observations taken at points visited. My first address given in New England, the home of my childhood, was at Jewett City, where the first W. C. T. U. in Connecticut was organized, and where our efficient state secretary resides. These leaders have never faltered. At Niantic I found an enterprising union and a live, and lively Band of Hope. Also a neat chapel, a home for both, erected by Mr. Luce, the husband of the county president.

At West Haven, found some sisters, silver-haired, whose earnest work prepared the way for scientific instruction in schools, and to secure "no license" at the election.

At Woodbury, mine hostess (a sick woman, scarcely able to leave her house), with strong convictions, firm will, and pointed pen, does much to keep the ball of truth rolling.

At Fairfield, where I failed to reach the field until nine o'clock, found a fine audience waiting, who invited me to return for three evenings the week following to make up for lost time. Here faithful work keeps "no license" victorious.

At Haddon organized a W. C. T. U. which is doing good work. Our meeting for organization was held in a church, fine in its proportions, that was built ninety years ago. The shingles then put on with hand made wrought nails, are in good preservation. May the purposes of the union formed beneath their shelter prove as lasting, nay more so, for truth can never die.

At North Manchester I was delighted to assist in organizing a Band of Hope. At least two hundred were present at the children's meeting. The excellent leaders in charge will make this band a power for good.

At Hartford the famous city of the "charter oak" I met wonderfully contrasting audiences, one in the jail in the morning, the other in an elegant church at night. How to have "union meetings," of such audiences is a question involved in prohibition. Mrs. Parsons, the county president, and other members of W. C. T. U. were present at both meetings. A faithful union holds its own in Colchester. I have visited other points but this must suffice for present observations. When in the west—lest none may know where that is I will say in Illinois and Iowa—I was always glad to find New England people; now I wish they had stayed at home. We need them.

"IT WAS A FAMOUS VICTORY."

Dear Union Signal:—A telegram has just reached me from Albany, that our compulsory temperance education bill, which passed the senate two weeks ago, has also passed the assembly, ninety votes in favor, two opposed. Knowing that the other states are watching our campaign with great interest, I hasten to share the good news with them, through our one connecting link, the national paper.

The campaign has been an arduous one, full of sacrifices and hard work, but the grand "end, justifies the means." Let me sketch briefly, for the encouragement of others, the modus operandi.

Encouraged by the success in Vermont, New Hampshire and Michigan, the scientific department in our New York state W. C. T. U. introduced a resolution at the annual meeting of the W. C. T. U. in October making the effort to secure a similar bill in our state, a leading line of work for this winter. Mrs. Hunt, national superintendent, was invited to assist in the work, giving the benefit of her voice and large experience. Petitions were scattered broadcast over the state. Letters and circulars were issued by the department, not only to over five thousand clergymen, and each W. C. T. U., but to Governor Cleveland, to each senator and representative, to the president of the senate and speaker of the house, to the superintendent of public instruction, the regents, commissioners and others, while hundreds of pages of literature accompanied these letters. Large audiences in our most conservative churches; in halls, normal schools, teachers' institutes etc., have been addressed by the national and state superintendents who have been constantly in the the field. The bill which passed in senate and assembly reads as follows:

The people of the state of New York, represented in senate and assembly, do enact as follows:

Sec. 1. Provision shall be made by the proper local school authorities for instructing all pupils, in all schools supported by public money or under state control, in physiology and hygiene, with special reference to the effects of alcoholic drinks, stimulants and narcotics upon the human system.

Sec. 2. No certificate shall be granted any person to teach in the public schools of the state of New York after January 1, 1885, who has not passed a satisfactory examination in physiology and hygiene with special reference to the effects of alcoholic drinks, stimulants and narcotics upon the human system.

Hon. Senator Gilbert became the champion of our bill in the senate, and Assemblyman Hunt in the house. Petitions have poured in upon the assembly, 39,600 being presented one day.

The Empire State now takes its place with Vermont, Michigan and New Hampshire, and if the law is but properly enforced, our million and a half of children will be forewarned and forearmed in reference to the temptations which await them. Some most marked providences have characterized our campaign. The superintendent of the department was called to Little Falls, N. Y., for a week of labor just before the campaign commenced. A W. C. T. U. was organized, and the whole place stirred by the enthusiasm with which they took up the petition work. An interested listener in her meetings was Mr. Titus Sheard, who also partook of the general public sentiment. This man, a Christian and a Sabbath school superintendent, became speaker of the assembly, and our staunch ally. Another marked providence came early through Mrs. Hunt's experiences. Forced to take an 18 mile ride to reach an engagement at Malone, in extreme weather, Mrs. Hunt, almost frozen, was detained there several days. But as a result of her suffering and sacrifice, Mr. Gilbert, who was made senator from his district, became interested, and afterward the wise and successful champion of our bill in the senate.

Could we but add to this teaching in our public schools, lessons upon virtue, reverence, honesty and morality, the number of appalling facts in reference to juvenile crime might be lessened, and a more hopeful outlook greet the nation.

THE PIE QUESTION.

Dear Union Signal:—Will you permit me to speak upon a subject which has caused me some concern? Every time the subject of "mince pies" is mentioned in your precious columns, I look anxiously for the expression of thought which must occur to others beside myself who are better qualified to express them, but rather than the subject should go "by default," I ask a hearing, and if no one agrees with me, I shall at least exorcise the nightmare caused me by other people's consumption of the dainty.

Will the dear, kindly ladies who offer temperance substitutes for the objectionable ingredient (cider) be good enough to explain wherein the juice of other fruits are preferable to that of the apple, since nearly all good housekeepers consider a certain degree of fermentation necessary to the perfection of mince meat. While it is entirely possible to avoid fermentation by making in small quantities, and adding the fruit juice just before baking, yet will people take that trouble generally? and if they do, will the pies be eaten? Let us realize that it is the alcoholic flavor which makes them so toothsome, and that in their use we harbor an insidious enemy. Even the mind which is quite willing to adopt the temperance recipe, will find itself unable to force the palate to approve. Why not discard the dish altogether, since we have known for more than thirty years past, that it is utterly antagonistic to healthful digestion, possessing elements more dangerous than the alcoholic properties.

We well know that the use of unwholesome food causes a craving for stimulants of all kinds. It is the opinion of scientists that dietary matters are little understood in our day, and it is pre-eminently the duty of members of the W. C. T. U. to seek information on the subject and bravely change the food of their households where particular articles are proven by experience or science to be injurious.

Dr. James G. Jackson says in reference to promises of total abstinence:

"I am convinced that such pledges may be made of substantially no effect, by the habitual use of foods and drinks which are found on the tables of Christian families in our country." The question of food is a most important one in its bearings upon our work.

We have the character of a noble organization to sustain. The projectors of our union had in view far higher aims than the rooting out of the alcohol evil. They sought to elevate mankind mentally, spiritually and physically, through the teachings of Christian temperance applied to all the affairs of life, to which the liquor reform is an indispensable accessory, and the direct present issue for which we labor.

Let us keep in view the loftier aims of our organization and seek to attain a higher plane of life, discarding immediately anything which we find to be antagonistic to that end.

OUR PHILADELPHIA LETTER.

Dear Union Signal:—We want your Pennsylvania readers to rejoice with us, as our president, Mrs. J. R. Jones, is again at her post. The members of the state convention which held its last session in Bellefonte, will not soon forget how they besought God to spare her life, and in answer to prayer, she is again with us to cheer and advise. She is an earnest, untiring, and fearless advocate for truth and temperance.

The temperance bells have rung out their clearest and sweetest notes here in Philadelphia during the week just closed. As Paul learned wisdom in the school of Gamaliel, so have we been learning for the past seven days from our Boston sister, Mrs. E. L. McLaughlin—a deep, clear, forcible, while logical advocate of the cause we so much love—and while she pressed home on her audiences, which were always large and appreciative, "total abstinence for the individual and prohibition for the state by the grace of God," she moved their hearts, aroused their consciences, and the earnest truths uttered found lodgment.

We held our ninth anniversary while she was with us and although we had bad weather we had an audience of about 1,200 people. Mrs. McLaughlin has made many friends for herself, and the cause in our city, and while the barriers of indifference and conservatism still remain and are still to receive the moulding and refining influences of God's grace, from the lips of His workers, we are assured that in time every vestige of prejudice will have disappeared, and the sons and daughters of Pennsylvania emancipated soul and body.

We received twenty-five members for our union and our collections covered all our expenses with a balance for our treasury. We take especial pleasure in recommending Mrs. McLaughlin to our sister unions everywhere.

Our work has taken an onward stride, has been brought fairly and squarely before the congregations in the different churches and parlor meetings, and everywhere the pastors received Mrs. McLaughlin cordially and proffered in some instances the use of their churches whenever she could be again with us.

A few of us being together the evening before she left and knowing well the help she had been to us individually and as a union, we felt warranted in making a future engagement for her, which is for eight days beginning Jan. 24, 1885. May God's choicest blessings rest upon her as she goes from one city to another, maintaining the cause she has espoused for life. And after life's fitful fever, may she with our unions of the state and nation, meet at the right hand of our Father with a grand army of the tried and tempted ones, who will then be able to say, "Unto Him who hath loved us and washed us from our sins in His own blood, unto Him be all the glory, forever."

Press on, dear Mrs. McLaughlin, and thou shalt surely reap a heavenly harvest for thy toil.

Mrs. I. Forrest,
Sec. Philadelphia W. C. T. U.

A WAY TO SPREAD SCIENTIFIC TEMPERANCE IDEAS.

Dear Union Signal:—It is a custom at county agricultural fairs, for special premiums to be offered by individuals or companies. Many use this as a means of advertisement, others use it to spread useful knowledge. Why should not the W. C. T. U.'s of each county in each state take advantage to advertise one of their methods of work and also by the efforts it excites, spread the knowledge of good and evil abroad. These fairs seldom issue less than fifteen hundred premium lists, most issue more.

Now if five dollars only were offered as a prize for the best essay by pupils of the public schools of the ages of twelve to seventeen years or otherwise on the nature of alcoholic or intoxicating liquors and their effect on the human system, what a fine preface it would make to the scientific instruction campaign that is to be carried on in Illinois this year. The premium lists could be obtained by the W. C. T. U. of the directors, and by them sent into each school district in the county. Notices of the premium or premiums could be inserted in the county papers, and attention further called to the offer. The county superintendent might be interested, many would doubtless call for temperance text books who otherwise would never have thought of them. Essays that do not take premiums will undoubtedly be heard of in the lyceum, debating club and school room. For who writes an essay that does not seek opportunity to read it? A public reading might be made of the prize essay.

The very judges called upon to decide the merits of the papers would learn much doubtless that was new, and if a public reading room was given many would be instructed.

One W. C. T. U. in southern Illinois has already voted to offer a $5. premium, on this subject, and the offer will soon appear to grace and adorn the premium list of their county. Let no chance escape us.

Ada H. Kepley.

LOOK ON THE BRIGHT SIDE.

The Rev. Frederick B. Carter, rector of St. George's church, Brooklyn, N. Y., preached on a recent Sunday morning, from II Cor. 10: 4: "For the weapons of our warfare are not carnal, but mighty to the putting down of strongholds."

In the course of this fine sermon Mr. Carter alluded to some of the strongholds of sin and Satan that had been or were being pulled down.

Slavery was, not many years ago, a stronghold that it seemed as if we could not pull down without shaking the very foundations of the republic.

Intemperance is another of Satan's great strongholds, but it is destined to fall like the other. The work done by the Church of England Temperance Society is already shaking it there, and why should we not hope for equal success on this side of the Atlantic?

Public opinion advances slowly but surely in all reforms. We are too apt to look upon the dark side in fighting against any great evil and so yield to discouragement.

In our warfare with the strongholds of Satan, whether in our own hearts or the world without, we must not forget to thank God for our victories. We should compare the past with the present and thank God and take courage.

A. H. H.

The day is not far distant when by universal consent ardent spirits in every form shall be cast out from the sick room.—Prof. Sewal.

A BOY'S SPEECH.

Who'll step within a grog-shop
A harmless glass to try
Of lemonade or soda?
Not I, oh! no, not I.
I'll go to better places
When I've a dime to spend,
Or when I seek for pleasure,
Or wish to see a friend.

His meat or bread or clothing
Or school books who will buy
From any liquor bondsman?
Not I, indeed, not I.
I'd rather help my neighbor
Who comes with you and me
To fight the liquor traffic
And set the country free.

And when we boys are voters
(We shall be by and by),
Who'll vote for liquor taxes
Or liquor laws? Not I.
I'll go for prohibition
And home protection strong;
I'll give my time and money
To help the cause along.

ETHEL'S BOOK OF REMEMBRANCE.

Once on a time, a friend wrote me that he had more children at his house all summer than he could possibly "shake a stick at." Now, I had not had so many as that; for, although the house was pretty full some days, I could shake a stick at them all, if I wished. And I did it occasionally, when they were very noisy indeed; only, I was in fun, and they all knew it, and therefore did not stop. At last, I said one day, "Do keep quiet, children, and let me hear myself think."

"Oh, yes," said Charlie, "If you will only think aloud, and let us hear you, too."

And his sister Gertie added, "Yes, and please think of the little Ethel that you used to tell us stories about."

"Little Ethel, indeed!" replied I. "Why, she is seventeen years old, and, being a high school senior, will not thank you for calling her little. However, if you will keep quiet I will let you hear me think aloud about Ethel's Book of Remembrance."

And this is the story I told them:

"When Ethel was about twelve years old, she used to run into our house very often, and tell us about her schoolmates. But, somehow, she got to telling the unpleasant things which they would not like to have repeated, and we began to hear who had missed, who had been punished, or who had been cross, stupid, mean, and hateful, until I said at last, "Suppose you turn to the next chapter, and tell me just as many good things about these boys and girls."

"'I don't remember those half so well,' she answered quickly.

"'If that is the case,' I replied, 'you have a very poor memory, and the next time I go to Boston I'll buy you a new one.'

"And, a day or two after that conversation, I bought at Ward and Gay's a blank book, with red covers, on the outside of which I got somebody to print in gilt letters, 'Ethel's Book of Remembrance;' and this, together with two bottles of ink, I gave to the young girl. 'There's your new memory, said I. 'Fill it up with stories about your classmates, if you wish.'

"'But what's the use of two bottles of ink?' 'Oh, I want you to write the good things they say or do in red ink, and the other things in blue ink; and be as careful to put down all the good as all the bad.'

"She promised; and, to my surprise, the new book came back in the course of a week, with simply these words on the wrapper, 'All Full.' That was harvest concert night, and the book was put away in my desk, where it lay untouched until the next Christmas eve. Then I opened it, while Ethel was with me, and found about two-thirds of the pages filled with red ink items, which showed how many good things she had recorded—a long list of kind words and generous deeds, which I read aloud as she sat quietly on a cricket by the open fire. 'That's the end of the red passages,' said I, as I finished, 'and now for the blue ones, which will tell me how stupid and hateful those same children can be!'

"'No, no! Don't read those,' she cried. 'I am ashamed to have you see them, and I wish I hadn't written them down. Give me the book, please, without reading the rest.'

"So I handed it to her with a smile, and watched her great astonishment at finding one-third of the book blank; for the blue ink, which recorded the unpleasant items, had entirely faded out, and left the pages almost as white as they were when I bought the book.

"'Why,' she exclaimed, 'what does it mean?'

"'Only that I had the blue ink made expressly for you. It is called Faultfinder's Ink, and fades out in a few days. If you must write down all those unpleasant items, be very sure and use this kind of ink; and, if you cannot get your bottle filled up again, use water, and it will answer every purpose.'

"Soon after that Christmas, Ethel moved to another town, and I did not see her until I went west last year. She showed me the little red book, and said she really did get a new memory when she received that present. And I think she did. For, when I asked her about the high school girls, she told me how pretty this one was, and how smart that one, and a third so good, and a fourth so obliging, until I finally inquired if they were all perfect and had not a single fault. That brought the old times back to her very strongly, and she blushed a great deal as she replied:

"'The blue ink you gave me faded out so quickly that I did not think it paid to write the faults down on my memory at all. So I looked for everybody's best things, and wrote those only in my new book of remembrance.'"

HAL'S CONVERT.

He was a rough-looking Irish boy. This at first glance; but his face was full of fun, his brown hair clung to his head in tight curls, his eyes were merry, gentle or fierce, according to his quickly changing moods. I am not sure that you might not have called him positively handsome, had he been well dressed and cared for.

In speech Mike was the worst boy in school. Why should he not be? His father was unusually intelligent for one of his class, a good workman, but given to drink, and when drunk he was foul of speech, abusive of his family, the terror of the neighborhood.

Mike's mother, ignorant, hard working, honest, quick-tempered, dealt many a blow to her children in her hot impatience, while she worked early and late to keep them clothed and fed. The boy had never learned the first lesson in self-control. How could he? When angry, as he was extremely often, his profanity was fearful to hear. All the better class of boys avoided him; all but Hal, a fine, manly fellow of twelve, whose home was as good as Mike's was bad.

Hal admired Mike, who rivaled him in foot-ball, base-ball, jumping, and in his classes even, for Mike was among the first there in spite of his disadvantages. Hal was distressed at Mike's profaneness, and determined to try to help him to give it up. This was how he did tt.

He took him home one day to see his fan-tailed pigeons; then to see his pups, a new and thriving but sightless family. One day Hal astonished his Aunt Hannah by asking her if she would have a secret with him. Would she knit a pair of cardinal mittens like the pair she knit for him last winter? Of course she would. Christmas morning Hal slipped the mittens into Mike's cold hands. Copies of the Youth's Companion found their way into Mrs. Dennis' kitchen, and Mike, who dearly loved stories, pored over them evening after evening. One morning the boys were alone, again admiring the pups.

"Mike," said Hal, "if you'll give up all your bad words, I'll give you one of my pups."

Now these pups constituted a prospective bicycle fund, at least the beginning of one. Their owner expected to sell the five young setters for at least sixty dollars. It cost a struggle to give up one.

Mike could hardly believe his ears. "I'll do me best," he said, and bore off his treasure in such a state of pride and delight as he had never known. He kept his word. The foul words slipped out many times afterward, but by and by he had so far given up the dreadful habit that his teacher praised him for his improvement.

"It's not meself it is," said the boy, "it's Hal intirely."

Some of the well dressed boys in school jeered at Mike, calling him "Hal's convert;', but do you not think Hal had found out the secret of helping those less fortunate than himself?—The Congregationalist.

A LITTLE BOY'S SPEECH.

A lady writes this true account of a little boy's speech to the Bay Window: "One Sunday afternoon there was a temperance meeting in the hall, and all the speakers were grown up except one, and that was our little friend Willie. This was his speech:

"'Here I am, gentlemen, three feet high,
Hurrah for temperance and the Fourth of July!
This is my motto, I'll try! I'll try!'"

The speech is a very good one, for see: it is short, it has a point, and it holds a purposel.—S. S. Advocate.

STOP HIM!

Stop whom? Why, that boy with a quid of tobacco in his mouth, a cigar between his teeth, a profane word upon his lips, a care-for-nothingness in his manner. Stop him! He is going too fast; he does not know his speed. Stop him before tobacco shatters his nerves; before pride ruins his character; before the loafer masters the man; before ambition and youthful strength give way to low pursuits and brutish aims. Stop all such boys! They are not to be classed among "our boys." They are the disgrace of their towns, the sad and solemn reproaches of themselves, and the worst trials on earth to their parents. Stop them! But if that is impossible, then shun them. They are bad boys. A good boy is one of the very best things on earth; but a real bad boy is one of the worst. The only hope is, that as he is a boy yet, it is possible he can be stopped, and right-about faced, and may yet be a good man. But if so, he must stop at once. No half-way work here! If he does not, he is gone, and there is no hope for him. Stop swearing! stop drinking! Stop chewing.—Sel.

LETTER TO THE PREVENTION ARMY.

NOT BY CAPTAIN DEBORAH.

Dear Children of the J. T. Unions all over the Land:—I have long had it on my heart to write you a letter. Although I can count the gray hairs among the brown I can still well remember when I was a little girl, and how delighted I was when I received a letter. Now I know boys and girls are the same today that they were forty years ago, and I should much delight to be able to send to each of you, individually, a letter written with my own hand, that I might tell you how much I love you and urge you all to become more earnest in our blessed work than ever before. As I cannot do that, I resort to the next best thing, the columns of our Union Signal, and if dear Mrs. Willard does not vote us a nuisance, I will often do the same thing. I hope every superintendent of a temperance school takes our paper, that she may be able to read these letters to the children, in order that I may reach every little heart. Last evening I attended an entertainment given by a temperance school. They called themselves a "Band of Hope," and I shall always like that name, since I heard a clergyman tell these children what it meant to him. He said "a band" was that with which a number of things are confined together; and here were a number of boys and girls bound together by a common purpose, and that purpose meant death to the liquor traffic, cemented by their pledge:

I promise not to buy, drink, sell or give Intoxicating liquor while I live,
From all tobacco I'll abstain,
And never take God's name in vain.

Then he told them what "hope" meant: "An expectation of gaining something desirable." Now our hope for the children of our land is, that they will grow up with just the sentiments inculcated by the above pledge; then when they are men and women they will see to it that the terrible curse of liquor is driven from our land. Do you wonder that we say "The children are the hope of the nation"? But dear boys and girls, you must not wait till you grow up in order to do something in this cause; you can work now.

I knew a dear little girl who kept tracts in her pocket and gave them to men on the street whom she thought looked as though they required such a reminder. Much to her delight, one of these men, influenced by her tract, came to a temperance meeting and signed the pledge. Two little boys brought about a reform in their own homes, by begging their mammas not to send them for cider to put in their mince pies, as it would make them break their pledge. These boys knew that there is alcohol in cider, and that "alcohol is a liquid poison," (you see they remembered their catechism) and they said so much on the subject that the mince pies were made after that without any cider or alcohol in any form. I will now tell you a secret, but will allow you to tell mamma. The pies tasted just as good with orange and lemon juice and the syrup from sweet pickled fruit, mixed with a very little vinegar, boiled to a syrup with brown sugar.

I want each little one to remember his or her individual influence. My little son came to me one day and said, "Mamma, need I go to the temperance school today? I want to go fishing." I told him, of course I wished him to go to school, he could go fishing the next day, which was Saturday. When he came into school five other boys came with him; if he had gone fishing so would they. So you see what an influence he had, although he did not realize it.

Next time I write I will try and tell you a story to prove that chidren are a power for good as well as evil. I wish you would each one write me a little letter, telling me of your school; the name of your superintendent; how many scholars you have; what you study and sing; what is your pledge, and anything else you care to write about. In the meanwhile I am,

Your loving friend,

Mrs. Anna M. Hammer,
Nat. Supt. Juvenile Temperance Department.

Add a circle complete;

MATTHEW ARNOLD'S PRAYER.

Thou who dost rule alone;
Thou who dost know thine own;
Thou to whom all are known,
From the cradle to the grave,
Save, oh, save!
From the world's temptation;
From tribulation;
From that fierce anguish
Wherein we languish;
From that torpor deep,
Wherein we lie asleep,
Heavy as death, cold as the grave,
Save, oh save!

When the soul growing clearer,
Sees God no nearer;
When the soul mounting higher,
Feels God no nigher;
But the arch-fiend Pride
Mounts at her side,
Foiling her high emprise,
Sealing her eagle eyes;
And when she fain would soar,
Makes idols to adore,
Changing the high emotion,
Of a pure devotion,
To a skin-deep sense
Of her own eloquence;
Strong to deceive, strong to enslave,
Save, oh save!
From the ingrained fashion
Of this earthly nature,
That mars thy creature;
From grief that is but passion;
From mirth that is but feigning;
From wild and weak complaining;
Thine all-self revealing,
Save, oh save!

From doubt where all is double,
Where wise men are not strong;
Where comfort turns to trouble,
Where just men suffer wrong;
Where sorrow treads on joy;
Where sweet things soonest cloy;
Where faiths are built on dust;
Where love is half mistrust;
Hungry and barren, and sharp as the sea,
Oh set us free!

Oh let the false dreamer fly
Where our sick souls do lie,
Toiling continually!
Oh, where thy voice doth come,
Let all our doubts be dumb,
Let all words be mild,
All strife be reconciled,
All pain beguiled.
Light brings no blindness;
Love no unkindness;
Knowledge no ruin; fear no undoing.
From the cradle to the grave,
Save, oh save!

AN INCIDENT.

BY SARA A. CLUTE.

In the cool evening twilight of a hot day in August, I heard a footstep on the stair following the inquiry, "Is Miss C. at home?" The voice was strange but pleasing. I stepped from my room to meet, on the landing, a form in the full fresh vigor of early manhood. Holding his hat and looking intently a moment in my face, he said, "I think you do not know me," to which I replied, "Pass into the parlor, please, a better light may reveal a friend." There are moments when we receive impressions unmistakable, and an impalpable something becomes the medium of truth as pronounced as that which the tongue utters, and this was one. I lifted the curtain and turned to meet the handsome eyes and sunburnt face of a traveler. Another moment of inquiry, and, stepping forward he extended his hand saying, "And you don't know Dan!" The genial grasp, the name, the handsome eyes, recalled a boy of sixteen who had been an inmate of my home twelve years before.

"Yes, I do know you, Dan," I replied, and glad am I to see you. Be seated, please, and tell me the record of your life since you were a student boy in this very house so long ago." And this is his story:

"You remember my mother had died before I came to live with you, and soon after my school year closed my father sold our farm not far from here and bought a much larger one near a thriving town in Iowa. I worked with him, and my sister also, whose husband had joined his fortunes with ours. We were very prosperous and happy. The years went on when suddenly my father sickened and died. Grieved and bewildered our hearts were heavy, and our hands for a time powerless. At length we all felt there was nothing better to do than to follow out his plan of business.

Less than a year ago I was in a field at work some distance from the house, when a storm of driving sleet came on, and my clothing was wet through and frozen, I took cold, and the next morning I wakened literally stiff. I could not move without pain. This state continued several days, when my sister, becoming alarmed, took me to a water cure for treatment. After a close examination by the attending physicians, I was told if my worldly affairs needed attention now was the proper time, as my case was a critical one. This being finished, I was put into a bath, seemingly in water at the boiling point; a vigorous rubbing followed, and I could move my limbs a little. The process was repeated the next day with equally favorable results. My improvement was so rapid that my sister left on the third day and I remained several weeks. Finally the day came when I was to be dismissed, cured. At the last interview with the leading physician, he said to me, "Young man, you have had a narrow escape. Few persons have had so severe an attack of inflammatory rheumatism and recovered so quickly, or, if relieved at all, have not been crippled for life. One thing has saved you. Had your blood been poisoned with tobacco or liquor, your chance for full recovery would have been very small." When he said this, Miss C. I thought of the advice you gave me the morning I left your home. "I do not remember that I made you such a gift. If it were good I hope you kept it; have you?" I asked. "Well," said he, modestly, I neither drink, smoke nor swear. I have come to thank you for your counsel, and now must bid you good bye." "But," I said, "stay to tell me if in all these years you have not found your inspiring angel, one to lead and lift, and love you, now you have left your boyhood teacher. "O, yes," he frankly said, while the brown cheek grew browner with emotions my question had raised. "I was to come for her last fall, but when the time arrived she was miles away and I was so stiff I could not raise my hand. She waits my coming now." His face glowed with well-earned expectation of coming joys. If mothers in the other life watch over their children here, I should think, at this exalted moment his mother's glance would make a shining passage in the heavenly ether through which, when life is ended, a pure spirit might pass to rest. I followed him to the doorway; he stood a moment in the lingering twilight taking in the boyish past and the manly future, then turned, saying, "If ever I come within ten miles of this place, I shall visit your home, and I hope to find you here. Good night."

The Sunday School Lesson.

MARCH 23. LESSON XII. 1884.

TOPIC: CHRISTIAN DILIGENCE.

Lesson Text.—II. Thessalonians, 3: 1–18.
Golden Text.—Be not weary in well doing. II. Thess. 3–13.
Time.— A. D. 53.
Place.—Paul writes to Thessalonica from Corinth in Greece.

1. When Paul asks Christians to pray for him and his co-laborers, it is that human hearts may be opened, not that the Divine heart may be touched. A good man was once asked by another who had long been seeking Christ, to pray for him. Said he, "I had far better pray to you, than pray for you." "I beseech you in Christ's stead," says the apostle, at another time "be ye reconciled to God," which comes very near praying to the unreconciled. A stronger faith is needed on the part of all Christians, in the willingness and ever readiness of God. We are all too much like the leper, and say in our hearts too often "Lord if thou wilt, Thou canst."

2. We have in this lesson very positive instruction as to what should be the conduct of the disciple of Christ toward those who do not after repeated injunction, follow in His ways and practice His commands. The word is "Withdraw thyself from such." Temptation which is needless, and in venturing upon which we cannot claim God's care and deliverance, comes certainly of continued companionship with "them that do evil." This is not church ex-communication, but a withdrawal from voluntary communion and comradeship. It is not punishment or the infliction of injury. It is simply in safety to Christian character. Withdrawal from association need not and should not mean enmity nor revenge.

3. The coming of Christ, Paul teaches, should not make any difference with our daily associations if we are living as Christ would have us. It will not matter if He finds us baking bread or holding meetings; patching garments or preaching Him, if so be we are possessed of His mind, doing all in His name and for His sake.

4. Neither should we weary as He delays His coming. The "well doing" of Christian life is to go on through the ages, and we need never expect any appearance of our Lord that will stop Christian work. Even the angels about His throne are servants, working in an angel's measure just as surely as we are working in our own. Well doing is not always the doing of great things. It is the purpose to serve God in all the ways of life, the little as well as great, which needs to be kept steadfast. Success is sure to wait on the steadfast. "Keep on running" even though the race seems lost. Even the swiftest runner sometimes fails at the last minute to reach the goal, and the sure and steady plodder takes the crown from him. During the war, a train of cars in possession of the Union army was seized while standing at the depot by a party of the opposing forces who managed to secure the engine and escape with it. Two blue coated soldiers ran after it in seemingly hopeless chase, but still they ran, nor gave over the attempt for miles and miles of running. Why they persisted, nobody could imagine, nor did they themselves probably, realize the apparently stupendous folly of their persistence. Finally, however, they came up to the fleeing, but now deserted engine, stopped by a huge tree which had fallen directly across the track, and which the small Confederate force had been unable to remove. They secured it and drove back over the scene of their race in triumph, simply because they kept on running—were not weary in well doing.

Two gentlemen sat near the door of a railway-car on a cold morning. A young man went out leaving the door ajar. One of the gentlemen rose and shut it, and then said: "This makes twice that I have shut this door after that man during the last few minutes. Somebody will probably have to do it for him as long as he lives." What an amount of work just in shutting doors will this young man impose on others during his life! Boys, shut the door after you! It is selfish and mean to take advantage of other people by making them do your work for you.

PRACTICAL PITY FOR THE RUMSELLER.

There is a large class of sufferers by the liquor traffic too often overlooked in temperance appeals who should have the compassionate sympathy of every philanthropist. We allude to the rum seller class.

The vender of intoxicating beverages needs commiseration because:

1. He is obtaining a livelihood from the community, and perhaps actually aggrandizing himself by a trade which is conferring not the least benefit to society in return—adding nothing to national prosperity or social enjoyment. Indeed, it must be very humiliating for a man to get his living out of others without giving the slightest equivalent for what in this traffic he receives. Moreover, he must know, unless utterly oblivious to the results of his doings, that he is not only of no use whatever to the world, as far as this trade is concerned, but is inflicting a positive, unmixed, enormous evil on the community. He is standing at the very fountain head of nearly every mischief that curses society—dealing out the essence of Pandora's box to his fellow creatures for pelf; thus enriching himself on tears, groans, fevers, delirium, pestilence, famine and bloodshed.

2. The liquor dealer should, in military parlance, be "relieved," because he is doomed to ultimate disappointment. Nothing but the inordinate love of money, doubtless, could induce persons to accept, much less ask for license to engage in this business; and yet lucrative as it seems, it is remarkable how few accumulate wealth, or at least retain for any considerable time, property thus acquired. It is a striking fact which has often been noted, that fugitive as is wealth in general no riches are so swift-winged as those obtained in this iniquitous way. Not only, as Mr. Wesley said more than a century since, are the very walls and roof and floor of the "poisoner general's" house stained with blood, but many examples might be cited, had we space, in proof of the assertion that, with rare exceptions, the property of dram sellers, however massive, "perishes with them," and often disappears before its accumulators are called to their final account.

3. The tapster is to be pitied also because he is engaged in an employment of imminent peril, both to himself personally, and also to his offspring. Indeed, no class of community is so much exposed to tempation as those who are constantly dealing out alcoholic drinks. Is not that law cruel which gives the least encouragement for men recklessly to rush into an expedition or snare for filthy lucre that is fraught with unmingled mischief to society, and also attended with such appalling waste of life to those who engage in it.

4. The vender of intoxicants, moreover, is one of the unhappiest of mortals. We speak not of the liquor dealer of fifty years ago when he knew not what he did, but of the intelligent man of this day who well knows what alcohol is and what it does, even if its deadly power is not intensified by poisonous drugs. Flippant, however, as is his tongue in defending his position as he stands at the tap, and self-complacent as he seems, his buoyancy of spirits is all assumed to stifle or conceal the tortures of an accusing conscience that, betimes, preaches more thrilling temperance lectures than human tongue ever delivered. Aye, often in the midnight hour when the bar room carousal is closed and the group of haggard penniless victims have been pushed into the street, perhaps to perish in the gutter, and the guilty vender has laid him down on his couch all feverish with excitement, then it is that conscience asserts its prerogative, and preaches to him in such thunder tones that he shivers as if the clangor of the judgment trumpet were already sounding in his ears. And although he makes all he can of the fact that he holds a "license" to prosecute this bloody work, and also that some of his customers are professed Christians (shame upon them!) yet so forcibly does the inward monitor perform its office that often he is not only almost persuaded never to sell another glass of liquor, but is led to exclaim as a certain rum seller was once overheard to say in the solitude of midnight, "O it is horrible business! If men who drink such stuff must go to hell, what will become of those who deal it out to them?"

5. Most of all, then, the persistent liquor dealer, whether distiller, brewer, hotel keeper, saloonists or druggist, should be pitied in view of his future doom. Ah, there is a depth and breadth of meaning to the "Woe" pronounced by the Almighty on the person who intoxicates his neighbor, of which the bustling tapster has at present, but little conception. In this world he has only a slight idea of the terrible desolation he is producing. Of course he knows something of its immediate effect, but cannot see the ultimate fruit of his doings. Little does he realize how efficient an auxiliary he is to Satan in colonizing the empire of perdition.

Could the frightful spectres of all whom the veteran rum seller has murdered by alcoholic poison directly and indirectly, together with the ghostly forms of all who have died of broken hearts, caused by the dram shop, be assembled together and each relate his woeful experience, it would be such a temperance meeting as was never witnessed on this planet.

The day is coming when the unrepentant drunkard-maker will behold more frightful things than these, and his ears be saluted by more terrific sounds. Knowing, therefore, the terror of the Lord, should not we be untiring in our efforts to persuade, aye if need be, compel our neighbors to abandon a traffic the consequences of which are so appalling? For "if light had not come they had not had sin, but now they have no cloak for their sin." For the sake of pecuniary gain they deal out alcoholic poison with their eyes wide open. They hoist the floodgate of fire which will burn to the nethermost deeps, in full view of its terrible results in this world, and with at least a fearful intimation of its dreadful issue beyond.

And now are we to be counted as the enemies of such men because we utter the truth? Nay, woe be to us if we refuse or neglect to declare all the counsel of God on this subject whether men hear or forbear. If seeing the sword coming we lift not loudly the voice of warning, the very stones will cry out against us. Let us remember the noble words of Martin Luther: "If an offense come out of the truth, better by far is it that the offense come than that the truth be concealed."

Does any one ask specifically what ought to be done about it? The answer is plain. If we would relieve society of an an intolerable burden; rescue the poor inebriate from his dreadful thraldom; the drunkard's wife and children from degradation and cruelty that eclipse the woes of darkest heathenism, and especially save the drunkard-maker from the doom that inevitably awaits the incorrigible evil-doer; we must stop nothing short of securing at least a total, legal, constitutional prohibition of the drink traffic in all its forms. Let us not be content to say this should be done. The rather one and all, by action as well as by our word, let our motto be: It can and must be done; and it will be done.

AMONG THE BOOKS.

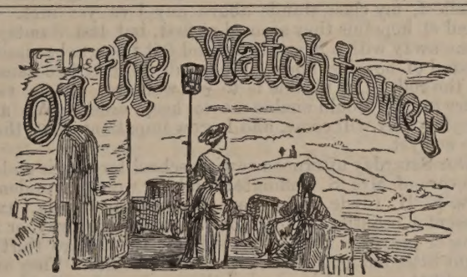
D. Lothrop & Co., Boston, have sent us Prof. A. A. Hopkins' excellent temperance stories "John Bremm," and its sequel "Sinner and Saint;" also Mrs. J. F. Willing's "Only Way Out," which has already been reviewed in our columns. That it is coming into wide favor, we are glad to know. It ought to command its place on the library shelves of the Sunday school, the public library and the reading room of the W. C. T. U. The first two named above, John Bremm and its sequel, though not new publications are new to us, and have been read with fresh appetite, quickened by the expectation of unusual viands, owing to their authorship. They have proved fully equal to the anticipation, and to our thinking deserve a rating far above the "temperance novel" of the past twenty-five years. The literary quality is good, the style clear and only occasionally hampered by affectations such as "mother mine," etc. The plot of the story, for it is one story, though two books, is natural and well sustained. The portraiture of beautiful character and fearful struggle is made with a pen of conscience, and the lesson so thoroughly diffused as never to be "lugged in" or obtruded.

The new edition of "Buried Cities Recovered," sent us by Bradley, Garretson & Co., of Philadelphia, is a book which deserves a more extended notice and faithful rescript than our space will allow. It is written by Rev. F. S. De Haas, for many years United States Consul to Palestine, and was published several years since as "Travels and Explorations in Bible Lands," but in its new presentment contains chapters on Egypt and its buried cities not incorporated before. From his official position the author has derived advantages by which the reader will profit, he having been personally connected with the explorations of Warren, Wilson, Drake, Ganneau and others, while to the Bible student his pages have a value above that of the ordinary scientific volume, as they contribute many buried facts to a corroboration of the Biblical record. As a book of travels the general reader will find the volume full of interest, and the story not of a stereotyped order. The traveler is, in this case, one who sees not by the guide book, but who dares to investigate with the reverent freedom of a truth-loving student. Egypt, the land of Israel, and Trans-Jordanic Palestine all pass before us in a vivid review which is aided by the remarkably clear and finely printed illustrations, very creditable to the publishers. Baalbec, Jerusalem, Damascus, with their magnificence but faintly seen in ruins still magnificent, are pictured in detail, and scenes and places that must ever be sacred to the Christian heart are thus made accessible to the stay-at-home traveler who misses the discomforts, but shares much of the pleasure of the author's journeyings and explorations.



Prof. Foster is hard at it in the Dominion parliament, pushing the prohibitory resolution which, after a preamble setting forth familiar reasons reads as follows:

Resolved, That this house is of opinion that the right and most effective legislative remedy for these evils is to be found in the enactment and enforcement of a law prohibiting the importation, manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors for beverage purposes.

It is to be seconded by Mr. Fisher, M. P., the mover and seconder represent, respectively, the goverment and opposition sides of the house; and members will have a chance to vote with perfect independence of their party ties.

Mrs. Judith Ellen Foster was introduced by Joseph Cook for an "interlude" at his Monday lecture a week or so ago. Mrs. Foster briefly showed from the organs of the liquor dealers, that high license had not at all checked the sale of liquor in Nebraska, and that the "Scott law" in Ohio had not reduced the number of saloons. She cited the statement of the treasurer of Hamilton county, which showed that 2,200 out of the former 2,220 rum shops had paid the tax and continued business.

A good word comes from Greenville, Ill., for James Clement Ambrose, whose lec ure on the "Sham Family" is said to be the very finest ever delivered there in the interest of good morals and character.

You remember that they held a very successful special election in Iowa a few weeks ago to choose a member of the lower house in place of the good and true man who died. A prominent democrat was asked if he lost anything on that election. He replied: "Oh no, I didn't lose anything on the election. I know better than to stake my money against the Lord and a W. C. T. U. prayer meeting."

And speaking of Iowa reminds me of another incident which has almost convinced me that "the Prince of the Power of the Air" had a great deal to do with certain haps and mishaps that befell Iowa legislators about the time of the prohibition vote. Representative Weaver, not he of unexplainable greenback-prohibition position, but a member of the lower house, fell on the ice at his home in Cedar Falls a few days before the crisis came in the legislature, disabling him seriously. Like the heroic Holbrook, however, he insisted on standing in his lot and place, and was carried from his bed to an easy chair, then to a baggage car, transported to Des Moines, conveyed to the capitol, carried up to the hall of representatives and reclining on his chair, his injured limb entirely useless, listened to the debate and answered every roll-call on the right side. He remained in the capitol building day and night, it being impossible for him to leave it. Women, take off your bonnets to such prohibition heroes!

Mrs. Marion B. Baxter made a handsome donation to the Iowa Orphan's Home on her recent visit to Council Bluffs by giving it a benefit lecture in the Grand Opera House, generously tendered for the purpose by the proprietor.

"Beef tea" and "hot water" are among the attractions now offered by the fashionable saloon for twenty-five cents the drink. The latter beverage has become the subject of scientific preparation, the successors of Delmonico giving the following proper recipe for "cooking" water:

The secret is in putting good, fresh water into a neat kettle, already quite warm, and setting the water to boiling quickly, and then taking it right off for use in tea, coffee or other drinks, before it is spoiled. To let it steam and simmer and evaporate unti the good water was all in the atmosphere, and the lime and iron and dregs only left in the kettle—bah! that is what makes a great many people sick, and is worse than no water at all.

This week Weston completes his "five thousand mile" total abstinence walk. He has suffered for it pecuniarily, but not physically. If it had been under the auspices of "sports" his purse would be vastly heavier. The temperance folk of England should not be behind the "world's people" in such a matter.

The Kirkwood Seminary class in scientific temperance passed a very handsome examination a short time since and the subject is popularized thereby.

The Dominion Alliance of Canada, in its annnal announcement to the public, calls for a W. C. T. U. in every town in every province. "This society," says the circular, "has proved an invaluable agency for work in every part of the Dominion."

An earnest Minnesota worker says of Miss Burnett's "Temperance Talks" in THE UNION SIGNAL:

I have not seen a temperance article that held better "meat" or more of it "in a nutshell" than Miss C. S. Burnett has packed into the first of her "Short Temperance Talks," and I hope the sisters will take time and care to digest it. When I began reading I said to myself that I would note the best points. Read the first and said, "I must remember that"; the second, "That too," the third, "That too," and so on to the end, when I concluded to take it whole.

Nowhere is there to be found a truer word concerning the undoing of the saloon, that this from Mary Allen West's trenchant pen:

Between the public schools and the saloon there is a conflict as irrepressible as that which made the first three quarters of this century historical in politics. The saloon does all in its power to unteach what the schools endeavor to teach. The school teaches the children to be prompt, punctual, efficient; the saloon teaches them to dawdle and loaf, and takes all the snap out of them. The school urges them to be industrious; the saloon trains them to be shiftless and thriftless. The school would inspire them with reverence for law; the saloon trains them to trample upon all law, human and divine. The school inculcates the principles of true citizenship; the saloon incuicates the lowest kind of demagogism. The school teaches them love to men and love to God; the saloon teaches them to despise the one and hate the other. In this irrepressible conflict, on which side do you stand? with the saloon or the school? "Choose ye this day," and then vote as you choose.

The temperance war is being carried into Africa in Lebanon, Mo. The plan of publishing the names of petitioners for saloon license having been adopted, lo! over sixty names of church members appeared in this unsavory connection. This year considerably fewer have graced (?!) the dram shop keepers' documents.

ON DUTY.

News from the Field.

MICHIGAN.

Petoskey.—Believing you are pleased to hear from all the W. C. T. U. workers I venture to write a little from this northern retreat. Our beautiful little town, of nearly 5,000 inhabitants, lies on Little Traverse Bay, being, as you see, very near to "much water." Yet the serpent is here persuading plenty of men that they need something "a little stronger," and eight saloons are taking in the dimes and dollars from many a needy home.

However, there is a radical temperance element here also making vigorous efforts against the enemy.

A letter from my old fifth district president with reference to crusade anniversary sent me out forthwith, in this my new home, looking up the W. C. T. U. with a view to a public meeting and a collection. Found the ladies somewhat discouraged but quite willing to again take up the oars and "pull for the shore." A re-organization was at once effected, a public meeting held with encouraging results, and five dollars secured for the National treasury.

Our union is now just one hundred strong, and still "there's more to follow," as new members are received at each meeting. This number includes about twenty young ladies who are active and interested; have also about thirty honorary members, though in this direction we have only made a beginning. We have set no bounds and expect to keep gathering in till a large number have taken decided ground.

Our monthly mass meetings are of much interest, the Presbyterian and Methodist churches uniting with us in the service.

Last Sabbath evening, (Feb. 17) the announcement that Mrs. A. S. Benjamin, president of the fifth district, would give her lecture, "Who is to Blame?" filled our hall to its utmost. The appreciation of this address by that large and intelligent audience was manifested by the close and unwearied attention which followed the speaker for fifty-five minutes, as she showed in her own clear and original manner how we ourselves foster that which is our destruction.

Mrs. Benjamin is giving some three weeks' service in these northern districts under the direction of Mrs. R. A. Campbell, eleventh district president, and we may well pray Heaven's blessings to richly follow her as she unflinchingly, and at the sacrifice of personal comfort, braves the winter's cold and storms, kindly enters the open doors, and becomes a light bearer unto many.

Following the Sabbath evening lecture, we held on Monday evening a drawing room meeting in the Cushman House parlors. The elegant accommodations proved none too ample for the two hundred and fifty that assembled. Printed invitations were sent to many of our best homes and were generally accepted. Mrs. Benjamin occupied about thirty minutes, telling us of "Our Work and Workers," which was highly enjoyed by those present as the hearty applause indicated. A few choice recitations, by our young ladies, and fine music by the young people's orchestra, added much to the interest of the evening; as did also the refreshments which followed, consisting of ice-cream, cake and coffee.

The influence of this meeting has told well in the interests of our work. Many are newly awakened, and the children are eagerly awaiting their first meeting, which is to be held the first Saturday in March. Of this we will tell you hereafter.

Each of our ladies keeps a nice little "bow of white" and wears it on all public occasions. Our town affords two weekly papers, each of which has granted us a "temperance column." The greatest difficulty we find is with our city officials, altogether too much of the conservative element, but we are trying to get from them just "all the law allows," and hope we may soon see better men in these important places. This, you know, with Bay View only a little distance, has become a popular summer resort, especially for hay fever patients. It is truly a charming retreat, with its beautiful waters, its bright skies and invigorating air, its coral agates, trout streams and woodland shades. It is also in close connection with Charlevoix, Mackinac, Traverse City, etc. Bay View is especially delightful, with its handsome cottages and lawns, spacious camp-grounds, etc.

Two of the leading hotels, the Arlington and the Occidental, have "bars" in them. Alas! alas!

We desire that a strong temperance influence shall reach the people as they flock to our shores, and we ask that all friends of temperance see to it that they patronize temperance places. The W. C. T. U. hopes to have coffee rooms in successful operation ere the season opens, where not only coffee, but ice-creams, ades, lunches, etc., can be obtained. We are making free distribution of temperance literature a prominent feature of our work. Have just sent for the beer series of union hand bills, and hope that ere long many will know the riches of the dear Union Signal.

Mrs. P. J. Howard, Pres. W. C. T. U.

PENNSYLVANIA.

The W. C. T. U. of Pennsylvania, foremost in all good works, stands side by side with our sisters of the Red Cross, in timely ministrations to the flood sufferers, along the Ohio valley. Several large and valuable boxes have been sent from the W. C. T. U. coffee rooms, Lock Haven, to the W. C. T. U. of Steubenville for distribution. Warren union has sent six large boxes of clothing and comfortables to the auxiliaries at Bellaire, Steubenville, Martin's Ferry and other points along the Ohio river.

The work of organization is being pushed in the Keystone state, as never before, and new unions reported continually. About a year ago the busy temperance "spiders" drew into their net a capital prize in the person of Mrs. Dudley Blanchard, the now indefatigable president of the W. C. T. U. of Lock Haven. Scarcely a year ago she did not know what the magic letters, W. C. T. U., meant, now she is the standard bearer of a splendid auxiliary, and with her noble co-workers has established a coffee room, Band of Hope with a hundred members, and gave me substantial aid in organizing four new unions in Clinton county viz., Mill Hall, Mackeyville, Salone, and Clintondale. These societies start out under very encouraging auspices.

The Warren union, one of the oldest in the state, born of the crusade, is having quite a revival. Mother's meetings, Bible readings etc., are among the specialties. A coffee room is one of its future possibilities. A number of new members have recently been added and Warren bids for the best talent in the W. C. T. U. lecture field. Tidiomte, for a few years dormant, has had a thorough resurrection and is ready for work, defensive and aggressive.

This pleasant little river town is the home of the Grandin brothers, three in number, whose lives and character are synonomous with the first syllable of their name. Bankers, manufactures, and owners of the celebrated Grandin farms of Dakota, they are foremost in all humanitarian and beneficent enterprises in their native town. They employ a small army of men and insist on sobriety among them. They promise a good club for The Union Signal. Youngsville union has just elected Mrs. Dr. Crawford superintendent of juvenile work, and wheels gracefully into line with the state union.

Thorough advertising by press and pulpit, has made the last two weeks of work in Clinton and Warren counties unusually fruitful. The union meetings held on successive Sabbath evenings in Lock Haven, Warren and Tidiomte, have drawn out splendid audiences and have given the work in these places a new impulse. Mrs. H. W. Smith, state organizer, and our matchless and tireless Ellen M. Watson corresponding secretary are determined to push the work through every county in the state. A surprising growth in public sentiment prevails in many sections. Mary Byron Reese.

Harrisburg.—We have four temperance schools in our town and I have the Sunday afternoon class, a short session, during which we sing, pray, read and talk temperance.

This class was formed last October, and if expertness and variety in mischief is indicative of brightness of intellect, my class stands above any I've yet met. A band of hopefuls they seemed at first, but last Sunday I came away with a heavy heart and felt them to be almost a band of hopeless ones. We number eighty-two names on the roll. Our trouble is to get workers; one or two more to help would enable me to keep order. We are praying they will come, and I grow impatient that they are not yet.

Our Saturday afternoon sewing school for girls is under the care of Mrs. S. Buffington, and our worthy president, Mrs. E. H. Clyde. They are progressing nicely, and present a beautiful picture, forty-six stitching away, or in song or prayer. They have made for themselves thirty-eight little red petticoats with cotton bodies. They are taught to sew, and keep what they make. Last Sabbath one little girl was so pleased with her new skirt she showed it to her mate, when another little one said, "I did not put mine on today because 'twas raining." A third said at another time her's was not to be worn until confirmation day, she being a little German Lutheran expecting to be confirmed shortly. All looking as though there were no skirts to spare. One little boy comes to the sewing school, and has made himself a shirt. He looks so happy in their midst. When we first opened in October we received boys and girls promiscuously. Three of us found it a hard task to preserve order; they were packed too closely. They seem to have too much energy for the number of escape valves permitted. 'Tis not so with the girls. I believe if the boys' fingers could be employed at our week day temperance schools it would help both teacher and pupil. Can the friends suggest some kinds of work for week day schools?

When I returned last Sabbath from my school, I was much discouraged.

A city missionary dropped in, and left me a volume entitled "Our Coffee Room," by Miss Elizabeth Cotton, whom I found had had a similar experience and discouragements to my own, and yet her heart by final results had been greatly cheered. So encouraged by her experience and years of looking to the Lord for help I take courage and go forward trusting there are brighter days in store for us.

We enjoyed our visit in imagination to Miss Willard's work room, and are glad to hear the subject of moral hygiene is to be brought forward. Oh for a general heart awakening for those who have suffered from that class of society who transgress and are not placed under the ban.

Give them the requisite knowledge, teach them the pure, healthful life and they will learn how illy we can afford to transgress, for truly the way is hard. How blessed it is to learn the truths of the heavenly life, appropriating them, feeding upon them, being lifted up, and proclaiming them wherever needed. This is our work, being led by the Holy Spirit.

Agnes Kemp, M.D.

Bellefonte.—Miss Narcissa E. White gave our county two weeks, and in that time delivered two lectures to organized unions, (our own, and Lock Haven), and eight to unorganized places. I am happy to report that, with one exception, they are that no longer.

Our most successful work in Bellefonte is in connection with our Band of Hope, of which Mrs. E. M. Blanchard is superintendent. It was something wonderful the way the children took hold of it, and reminded me of the enthusiasm of the children's crusade. They flocked in numbers of eight to ten to her house to sign the pledge, and many of them took the triple pledge. The Band of Hope now numbers over 200. Our Y. W. C. T. U., organized during our state convention held here in October, numbers about forty ladies and gentlemen, and they are very enthusiastic. This winter they carried around petitions, and defeated three wholesale liquor sellers at our court.

We met our school directors in the fall, and secured through their courtesy the passing of a compulsory law in our public schools on teaching scientific temperance. We furnished all of our teachers (some seventeen) with Richardson's Text Book.

Then we visit our schools each week, and distribute leaflets, etc. We are now raising funds for a teacher's library. Our private schools also use Richardson's Text Book, and many of our teachers are interested workers.

We have done nothing lately to influence legislation, but presume we will soon have work to do in that line. In regard to the ballot, I can hardly report at all. I know of one husband who is willing his wife shall vote on the prohibition question whenever it comes up, and there are doubtless others, but—well we will no doubt be ready to fall in line with our other W. C. T. U. sisters when the time comes, and the question will never be settled I believe until it does come.

Mrs. John P. Harris, Pres. W. C. T. U.

NEW JERSEY.

Trenton.—I am aware that you have had but few communications from Trenton, but it is not because our W. C. T. U. is asleep, or is not doing all in its power to awaken an interest and educate our people on the all important question of the day.

In a general way we see little results from our efforts, but we have learned to leave results with God, knowing that our part is simply to scatter the good seed.

The last two weeks we have witnessed wonderful things in our conservative city, and God has truly visited us.

We believe as yet it is as the gentle shower before the abundant rain of blessing that shall fall upon us. God put it in the heart of our union to invite Messrs. Mabee and English to come and hold some meetings here, and as several small churches in the outskirts of our city were offered for our use, we considered the way was open, and those good Christian workers came at the appointed time.

We found at the very first meeting that no small audience rooms would do, but immediately some of our largest churches in the centre of the city opened their doors and invited the workers to come.

Many of our ministers said "This work is of the Lord," and gave the gentlemen the right hand of fellowship; the meetings increased in size and interest from night to night, until there was no place large enough to hold the people all through these last two stormy weeks.

Nearly 2,000 signed the pledge, and Mr. Mabee left us with a well organized Reform Club of over 200 men well officered by Christian men. They held their first public meeting in the opera house, which was literally packed, February 24.

The best part of this movement is that Christian people have had their eyes opened as never before, to see that there is something for them to do, if they would see the dram shops closed, and the club does not consist of reformed men only, but Christian men and ministers have all banded together to fight the evil. Pray for us in Trenton. Anne T. Baily.

SOUTHERN GLEANINGS.

Maryland.—The committee of arrangements are preparing for a visit from Mrs. Emily McLaughlin of Boston. The kindergarten, superintended by Mrs. Welsh formerly of Savannah, is in successful operation; it is hoped that a school on a larger scale will be established in the near future.

West Virginia.—The annual meeting will take place early in March. Mrs. Emily Chambers, the energetic president, is also superintendent of R. R. work for the state. At Parkersburg, the able press superintendent, has just organized a Y. W. C. T. U., who hope one day to welcome Anna Gordon to address them.

Georgia.—Mrs. Chapin and Mrs. Sibley have been very busy in this state. Mrs. Chapin organized three unions in one day. At one point on the road, where she had an appointment, the mayor of the town, the college students and others were waiting to receive her. She has gone to attend the Florida convention. Mrs. Hannah Whitall Smith and Mrs. Dickinson will also be in attendance, thence she will meet appointments in Louisiana, Mississippi, Arkansas and Texas.

ALABAMA.—The union at Tuscaloosa is doing good service, also that at Gadsden, under direction of Mrs. Woodliff, the state president. The national organizer, Miss H. G. Moore, has been most cordially welcomed and appreciated in the state. The press is lavish with encomiums, styling her an eloquent, logical, persuasive advocate of prohibition. Her last engagement was in Mobile. She goes thence to Texas.

TEXAS.—The Lone Star state is fortunate in having for its president Mrs. Beauchamp, an able writer and speaker, as is Mrs. Lizzie Johnson, the corresponding secretary. This consecrated worker, deeply interested in prison work, has an enviable record in the results of her prison visitations. She is looking forward to Mrs. Chapin's coming, whose influence in the community not only among the white, but the colored population also, is something wonderful. Their vote is necessary to secure prohibition, for in most of the southern states they hold the balance of power.

MISSISSIPPI.—The women of this state are not idle. Mrs. Inge worked with all her soul for the Corinth prohibition law, and after witnessing its passage in the lower house, she went immediately to the senate, and there, taking some of the anti-temperance senators by the hand, plead with them to "vote for my bill, it is in the interest of my home, my people," and she succeeded in pledging some of the hardest cases to the measure. There is scarcely a limit to a determined woman's influence. Mrs. Foster who passed that way last year will be glad to hear of this. MRS. G. H. MCLEOD.

NEW YORK.

PEEKSKILL.—A mass meeting of the citizens of Peekskill on the Hudson, was held on the evening of February 19, in the First M. E. church to listen to an address from our national superintendent of scientific temperance instruction, having reference to a bill now pending before the legislature of the state of New York, asking for the enactment of a law that shall require such instruction in all the schools that are under state control or supported by public money.

A large and enthusiastic audience filled the house and after hearing the able and entertaining address of Mrs. Hunt, the audience left feeling that if the bill should pass the house and become a law, the state of New York would be largely indebted to the persevering labors and forcible appeals of this earnest Christian woman, who is making such a great sacrifice of time, strength, and the quiet of home, during these best years of her life, to bring about such wonderful results.

At the close of the address the following preamble and resolutions were offered by Dwight Herrick, Esq., and adopted by the entire congregation:

WHEREAS, A bill is now pending before the legislature of the state of New York entitled, "An act relating to the study of physiology and hygiene in the public schools," the design of which is that in all the schools supported by public money, instruction shall be given in these branches, with special reference to the effects of alcoholic drinks, stimulants and narcotics upon the human system, and

WHEREAS, Such legislation looks to better citizenship, and is, therefore, within the power and duty of the state; therefore,

Resolved, That we, citizens of Peekskill, and citizens of the state of New York, approve the bill in question and recommend its speedy enactment.

Edward Wells, Esq, also offered the following resolution which was unanimously adopted:

Resolved, That the foregoing resolutions be published in our village papers, and that a committee be appointed by the chairman of this meeting, Hon. George W. Robertson, to present these resolutions to Hon. James W. Husted, member of assembly, with the respectful request of the meeting that he will give the said bill now before the assembly, his earnest support, and will aid in securing its passage into a law of this state.

Mr. Herrick was appointed such committee.

A. M. STEWART, President W. C. T. U.

DELAWARE.

WILMINGTON.—Yesterday was one of the red letter days in the history of our No. 2, or colored W. C. T. U. For some weeks arrangements for a mass meeting under their auspices had been pending, which yesterday were successfully culminated. By invitation Mrs. Frances E. W. Harper, our national superintendent of work among colored people spent the day in our city. The meeting of the day was held in our largest African church in the afternoon at 3 o'clock. Before the hour arrived a large audience was seated and when Mrs. Harper began speaking every available seat was taken, and some remained standing. The address was of more than an hour's duration, but commanded the respectful and interested attention of all. Mrs. Harper, from her experience in active work during the days of slavery knows how to speak to her people, and her experience in the contest we are waging in these days of slavery to the rum traffic gives force to what she says. The response to the appeal for financial aid was met most liberally, the collection amounting to very nearly twenty dollars. A good example for all of us.

The union has a record to be proud of, considering the circumstances of its organization. It numbered previous to this meeting some thirty members; seventeen new names were secured at the mass meeting, and also a greatly awakened interest which will result in others joining.

The reading room for working men, under the care of our Y. W. C. T. U. is just at the end of its first year, and we feel we have much to be thankful for. Our books books show that 7,000 visitors have availed themselves of the attractions of the room, which is well supplied with daily and weekly papers, illustrated periodicals and a library numbering over two hundred volumes. Our gospel meetings are increasing in interest, held every two weeks, the services conducted in a very simple manner.

The first steps towards the establishment of a kitchen garden have been taken, and we are expecting Miss McClees during the coming month to give the necessary lessons to our normal class.

We are looking forward with interest to the 9th of March when we are expecting Mrs. J. Ellen Foster, and have arranged for her to speak in our opera house, at the time of the M. E. conference which convenes in our city. Hope to have such a meeting as will be worthy of a report in these columns. M. S. H.

MONTANA.

DILLON.—The W. C. T. U. of Dillon is quietly and resolutely holding on to the work in the face of many discourgements. The Band of Hope has a regular attendance of about fifty. Our union is small and we have everything to learn. The people have to be "educated up" to temperance work and principles in this new country where the liquor element has had full sway from the first. The Dillon Tribune makes the following pleasant mention of our reading room:

"Thanks to the ladies of the W. C. T. U., Dillon now has what was long needed, a first-class temperance reading room and a lunch house, where a nice, hot cup of coffee, pies, cakes, etc., can be purchased at moderate prices. This reading room, located centrally on Montana street, is growing more attractive and it is better appreciated as its benefits are more fully understood. In the evenings the reading room is a retreat from the temptations of the saloons, and there are many, with room for many more, who welcome this place of public resort and its gratuitous attractions. The thanks of the community are due the ladies of the W. C. T. U. for opening this institution." MRS. JAMES KIRKPATRICK.

BUTTE CITY.—We had our first public meeting on Sunday evening, February 17. The ministers were invited to take part with us, and all did so except two, who seem to stand aloof when temperance work is being done; but when we know how unpopular the temperance cause is, we are not surprised that even ministers here stand back. But let me assure you that the day is not far distant when it will not be so.

Our meeting was held at the Reform club reading rooms, which were filled to their full capacity; yes, and so overflowing there was no standing room left unoccupied. There were a number of good speeches and several expressed their intention to join us in our noble work. Since the public meetings have been started it is hoped that they will be kept up, thereby keeping the public agitated about temperance. MRS. J. W. CHAPMAN,

Corresponding Secretary.

MAINE.

OLD ORCHARD.—A little union was formed here about a year ago of eight members. It has steadily increased, till they now number fifty-six. The president, Mrs. Jas. Brown, a veteran temperance worker, is fully alive on this subject. A woman past sixty-five, with many home cares, she has attended every meeting, with one exception, when she was detained by sickness in the family.

The union has held public meetings once a fortnight. Several ministers from Portland have kindly lectured for them. Our state president, Mrs. L. M. N. Stevens, who is ready to help anywhere along the line, gave an evening of encouragement with her cheering words and unfailing zeal. The pastor of the M. E. church, Rev. W. H. H. McAllister, is a radical temperance man, and has fearlessly spoken the words of truth and soberness to the people of Old Orchard.

God has blessed the union with many noble Christian women who are ready to "do with their might what their hands find to do" in this cause. Some of our meetings have been held under very unfavorable circumstances, but by their presence, words and prayers these sisters have shown that they were in earnest.

The influences going out from the union and the persistency of its members, has made an impression and public opinion is quite in advance of what it was a year ago. Calls have been made at several places where liquor was sold, with good results. One apothecary was fined $800 and he afterward left town; also one house of ill repute; its inmates hearing they were to be called on the next day, left during the night. A Band of Hope, under the charge of the union, is in a flourishing condition. Altogether the outlook is good and much is hoped for the coming year.

The annual meeting was held at the house of the president, who recently fell on the ice and broke her wrist, but bears it with Christian fortitude, feeling that it is among the "all things," that work together for good.

The following officers were chosen for the year: President, Mrs. James Brown; corresponding secretary, Mrs. Irving J. Brown; treasurer, Mrs. D. F. Hasley. With such workers much will be accomplished for "God, and home and native land." M. T. ANDREWS.

VIRGINIA.

LINCOLN.—While we cannot boast of the number of UNION SIGNALS that circulate in our state, yet we do know that the leaven is working, and we must be content to allow time for prejudice and pride to be overthrown. When these enemies of all progress are dethroned our car of gospel temperance will move forward. We are just taking the first steps in organization, and we can see that in some directions there has been a gain. Our late convention (the first) was held at Richmond on October 17-19, 1883, and though small was a success. In many places the White Ribbon army has many adherents. The department of scientific instruction in our schools has been successful in one county, —the teachers giving oral instruction in almost every school, — while in other parts of our state good progress is being made in the same direction. Bands of Hope are multiplying, and the numbers increasing at Richmond, Staunton, Alexandria and at other points. Our standard is supported by a noble army of young recruits. Our department of heredity and hygiene, with Dr. Tamgin Jannez at the head, is doing service in that much needed reform. We would be glad to have some of the gifted National workers take our neglected state in their route, and help the woman side of this question in the Old Dominion.

ILLINOIS.

CONVENTION OF FIFTH DISTRICT.

The fifth district held a convention in Marengo, the 13th and 14th of February. On account of the inclement weather the delegation from abroad was small, but the local interest was great, and large audiences were present at all the sessions.

The convention opened Wednesday afternoon at o'clock, the president, Mrs. S. B. Sill, of Aurora, presiding. An address of welcome was given by Mrs. S. A. Crissey, of Marengo, who in fitting words welcomed the delegates and visitors to "our town, our homes, and our work." The response was given by Miss F. E. Willard, who said that in this whisky-making, beer-selling state of Illinois she was glad to be welcomed to a town that had not had a liquor saloon for twenty years.

Much routine business was disposed of, and then a stirring talk was given by Mrs. S. B. Wilkins, of Rockford, who graphically described the work of the W. C. T. U. of that city. The address was full of helpful hints to other unions. Mrs. Wilkins and Miss Willard also presented the claims and excellencies of THE UNION SIGNAL with such good effect that nineteen subscriptions to the national organ was the result of the appeal.

An essay, "Liberty and Intemperance not in Harmony," was given by Miss Mansfield, one of the teachers in the Marengo public school.

Through the kindness and liberality of some of the business men of Marengo, the opera house was provided for the first evening session. Though the night was stormy some six or seven hundred people were present to listen to Miss Frances E. Willard, who gave the address of the evening.

Thursday morning Miss Anna Gordon addressed the convention upon young ladies' societies and juvenile work.

Mrs. Dr. Whitford, of Elgin, gave a scholarly paper upon "Scientific Tracts Concerning the Human Tissues" illustrated by the blackboard, and object lessons.

Thursday afternoon Mrs. Henry, of Rockford, gave a brief address upon "Temperance Evangelistic Work," relating some of her experiences. The rest of the session was devoted to reports of the local unions, a pleasant entertainment by the Marengo "Earnest Temperance Workers," conducted by the president, Mrs. L. W. Sheldon, and a talk to the children from Mrs. Mary B. Willard.

Thursday night the church was crowded to its utmost capacity with people whose interest had steadily increased during the sessions of the convention. Mrs. Willard, editor of THE UNION SIGNAL, gave the closing address, dropping many seed thoughts into the minds of the assembly, concerning the future of woman's work in temperance, and how it could be made most effective.

Secretary pro tem.

REPORT OF CHRISTIAN COUNTY CONVENTION.

The Christian county W. C. T. U. met in convention at Pana on Tuesday the 26th, and adjourned Wednesday night. The sessions were well attended, and much interest manifested throughout the entire convention. Four unions were represented. Mrs. Orendorf, our district president, was present, and assisted us greatly with her kind words of advice and encouragement. Tuesday evening the audience was entertained by an excellent address of welcome by Mrs. Gilbert, of Pana, to which Mrs. Orendorf reponded; an exceedingly spicy address by Mrs. Goldsmith, of Grove City. Mrs. McBride, county president, closed the exercises of the evening with a well rendered recitation.

The second evening brought us a treat in the way of a very fine lecture, by Mr. J. C. Ambrose. "The Sham Family" was mercilessly exposed, and of course the liquor traffic and those engaged in it came under the head of shams. Prohibition and woman's ballot were popular themes during this convention. I cannot refrain from complimenting the ladies of the Pana Union on their success in making delegates feel at home. Rev. Mr. Higgs, pastor of the M. E. church, whose wife is president of the union, seems to be their right hand man.

A Member of the Convention.

Nashville.—Let me tell the readers of The Union Signal a few words about the work here.

Mr. Jacob Hoofstitler organized a club of reformed men a year ago last November. The anti-license ticket was defeated last spring, but since then the prohibitionists have increased greatly in numbers. Also, many country clubs have been organized. A temperance tabernacle, costing over $4,000 will be built this year; $3,200 has been subscribed already. One of the saloon keepers has closed his grog shop and is going to join the club.

A county convention of the prohibition party was held on the 22d of February. May God's blessing rest upon them in the work. Paul L. Phillips.

ILLINOIS NOTES.

—We want to remind our county and district presidents again to send notice of conventions that literature may be sent them.

— Miss West is arranging fer a meeting of the executive committee at Galesburg, March 30. Let each member of the committee bear this in mind and plan accordingly.

—The annual meeting of the Central W. C. T. U., Chicago, March 20, promises to be of unusual interest. The sessions will occupy the entire day. Miss Willard will give the address of the evening.

— Conventions are announced at Troy, March 20 and 21, and at Hillsboro, March 26 and 27. Miss West and Mrs. Willard are to be at both, and Mrs. Babcock, our vice president, is expected at Hillsboro.

— The 17th district (Mrs. A. V. Boulter, president), will hold its annual district convention at Hillsboro, Montgomery county, March 26 and 27. Mrs. Willard and Miss West will be there to add to the interest of the convention.

— The sixty-eight thousand Leaflets already published have well nigh exhausted the $500 appropriated for our State Leaflets, and yet a cry for more is heard from all quarters. Shall we stop the supply, or will the unions roll in their pledges for our state work?

VERMONT.

Mrs. Greene, our state president, has been in Addison county, under the combined auspices of the county W. C. T. U. and the Addison County Temperance Society. The first meeting at Vergennes was very largely attended and the addresses by Rev. Mr. Speare and Mrs. Greene were warmly applauded. At Monkton Mrs. Greene was alone, and though the roads were in bad condition from the long thaw, there was much enthusiasm, and many new members were added to the organization. A regular love feast was held.

At Bristol the Baptist church was well filled and Rev. Mr. Palmer aided Mrs. Greene to revive the declining union, arousing lively interest at the two meetings held. On the way to Addison Mrs. Greene was thrown from the sleigh at Weybridge and her injuries were such as to detain her there in helplessness for a fortnight, after which she was obliged to return to her home in St. Albans. Preparations are now going on for the Addison county institute to meet in the county early in May or June. The ladies of this state will not suffer this glorious cause to wane for lack of stirring up.

Temperance day in Middlebury was celebrated by meeting in Congregationalist church addressed by Mr. Whitcomb of Burlington. This gentleman was afterwards present at the temperance sociable the same evening and expressed much gratification at the manner in which the W. C. T. U. conducted their monthly parlor meetings.

NEWS IN A NUTSHELL.

The Y. W. C. T. U., auxiliary to the Brooklyn (N. Y) union upon the hill, is doing a work that cannot be over estimated. At their regular meetings papers bearing upon the different phases of the temperance question are presented, and sociables are held every month at the home of one of the members, to which those young ladies and gentlemen whom they wish to reach and win for total abstinence are invited. The active practical work done by this union, is the sustaining of a free reading room for boys, open every evening from 7:30 to 10 o'clock; also a temperance school at the News Boys' Home.

The Y. W. C. T. U. of Cornwall, Vt., gave a successful entertainment, Feb. 15. An able and instructive lecture upon Martin Luther was delivered by Prof. Foster, of Middlebury College, who kindly gave his services free of charge, and this was followed by an oyster supper. This union has been recently organized but is rapidly growing and all seem in a working spirit.

Sterling (Ill.) has declared for licence at its recent election—"Sold out to the emissaries of the Evil One," writes the secretary of the W. C. T. U., adding, "But if they think that we are going to give up the struggle, they are very much mistaken."

C. J. Holt has just closed a meeting of ten days at Pierce City, Mo. Great good has been accomplished. Over 500 signed the pledge. A reform club and a C. T. U. have been organized and eighteen new members added to the W. C. T. U.

At Canisteo, Steuben county N. Y., the W. C. T. U. served a free lunch on "town meeting day," and were abundantly rewarded for all their labors by the election of a ro license board by a majority of twenty-seven.

The Murdock, (Ill.) union, with many others of the "white ribboned army," has substantially remembered the Ohio sufferers by sending a box of bedding and clothing, valued at $45.

George Woodford's meetings in Springfield, Mo., have been attended with grand results. Under his labors, Springfield has been stirred up as never before on the temperance question.

The Alton (Ill.) Band of Hope has just given a delightful "Jug Breaking" and literary entertainment which netted the Band forty-five dollars.

The temperance wave is still sweeping everything before it in south-west Missouri. At Carthage over 1,000 signatures to the pledge have been secured.

Mrs. Marion B. Baxter's lectures at Galva, Ill., Feb. 29 and March 2, are very highly commended.

INFLUENCING THE PRESS.

The press of the country is the index of its civilization; the lever of its morality. How shall we as temperance workers write upon it the truths we believe, and through them move humanity to higher grades of thought, to clearer conception of duty, and greater loyalty to God? As more and more the home is recognized to be the central power of the world, temperance, which means knowledge, purity, God-likeness, is revealed as a primal law. How shall this law be so inwrought into human brain and heart as to renew the creation defiled by ignorance, sin and selfishness?

The years are continually casting new moulds for human life, and the press, ever keeping pace with the demands of the age, is itself reformed by reformers. What impress shall the four-fold character of the W. C. T. U. make upon the future through the avenues now so generously opened to our care? For it is not so much a question of obtaining as possessing the land. About ten thousand papers are published in the United States. Is not this good year, the first of the new decade, the time to enlarge our borders and see how many we can pre-empt? And of those whose pre-emption deeds are already written out, shall any be left unoccupied? How shall we possess? how occupy? Only by intelligent, faithful prayerful labor.

The purpose of this department is:

1. The education of public sentiment in favor of temperance, by articles, editorial or contributed. in all newspapers, both religious and secular. Sanitary science, laws of hygiene and heredity, facts, pointed arguments, etc., come especially under this head.

2. The information of the public regarding the movements of the W. C. T. U., its history, aims, and methods of work, its scope and power and usefulness.

The objective points are the secular and religious weeklies, and the daily newspapers, especially the metropolitan press in the twelve cities, and the associated press and co-operative newspapers, to be reached by means of state and local superintendents, and special correspondents; capital cities to receive special attention during political campaigns and sessions of the legislature.

1. Plans of work: Each state and territory is represented by a superintendent who shall have charge of the work therein, with assistant local superintendents in each union, if possible, these to be appointed by the union. Note. (In states where the work is too great for one superintendent to have proper oversight, it would seem advisable for each congressional district to have a superintendent appointed by the state W. C. T. U. would be chairman, who would communicate with the National superintendent. This division of labor would increase the effectiveness of our department.)

2. The state superintendent should understand her field of labor by acquaintance with the papers, their character and influence in the community, and value as a medium for temperance literature. To this end secure a list of papers in the state, and divide the same in counties and towns. A personal letter to each editor, so far as may be practicable, is necessary, setting forth earnestly the claims of temperance, and respecttully asking for such favor as he may be disposed to grant, whether the insertion of editorial, contributed or selected articles, or the setting apart of space for a W. C. T. U. or temperance department, to be conducted by a local superintendent. This does not conflict with the work of others, but enables the superintendent to direct her available forces with economy, and to provide for the supplying of all papers.

3. Secure a list of local unions in the state and the appointment of a local superintendent in each. Urge that this matter receive the attention it deserves, and that the best woman for the duty be chosen. Help her all you can by suggestions, and encouragement, by occasional articles and frequent letters. All the zeal of any department is wasted without intelligent comprehension of its needs, and tact as well as talent, wisely used.

1. Suggestions to local superintendents: When space is granted for the temperance work, either by your own solicitation or that of the state superintendent, you will need a varied supply of temperance and religious papers, first among which, and best, stands The Union Signal. Don't try to enlist as a soldier without ammunition. You should also have access to standard books, as Dr. Richardson's "Lesson Book," Pitman's "Alcohol and the State," etc. The community to be influenced should be carefully studied. Uphold at all times the honor and dignity of the grand organization to which you belong. Speak of its departments and what is being accomplished. Gather all items of general interest, making them fresh with your own inspiration. Give prohibition arguments where you can. If the editors will not permit these, choose scientific arguments. Make your paragraphs polished and pointed.

2. As the W. C. T. U. stands the invincible advocate of prohibition, each superintendent should consider herself a sentinel on duty, to make reply to, or refutation of, fallacies concerning total abstinence and prohibition, allowing no misleading statement to go without its antidote. If the superintendent cannot reply, let her write to her superior for help, or turn to some bright and well informed person in her own community.

3. Cultivate a strong home interest by mention of work in your own state. When meetings are held, try to have the editor report them; if he does not, report them yourself. Interest the union to help you watch for bright clippings and pithy facts. Make yourself an integer of the work by constant, devoted labor.

4. Keep your state superintendent informed of your success. Ask her advice when necessary, and send her an occasional copy of your paper.

Dear sisters, in no other department of the W. C. T. U. do we need more faithfully to keep the "trysting time with God." Let us ask His blessing on our united labors to advance His kingdom.

Esther T. Housh.

An Efficient Remedy.

In all cases of Bronchial and Pulmonary Affections is AYER'S CHERRY PECTORAL. As such it is recognized and prescribed by the medical profession, and in many thousands of families, for the past forty years, it has been regarded as an invaluable household remedy. It is a preparation that only requires to be taken in very small quantities, and a few doses of it administered in the early stages of a cold or cough will effect a speedy cure, and may, very possibly, save life. There is no doubt whatever that

Ayer's Cherry Pectoral

Has preserved the lives of great numbers of persons, by arresting the development of Laryngitis, Bronchitis, Pneumonia, and Pulmonary Consumption, and by the cure of those dangerous maladies. It should be kept ready for use in every family where there are children, as it is a medicine far superior to all others in the treatment of Croup, the alleviation of Whooping Cough, and the cure of Colds and Influenza, ailments peculiarly incidental to childhood and youth. Promptitude in dealing with all diseases of this class is of the utmost importance. The loss of a single day may, in many cases, entail fatal consequences. Do not waste precious time in experimenting with medicines of doubtful efficacy, while the malady is constantly gaining a deeper hold, but take at once the speediest and most certain to cure,

BRAIN AND NERVE FOOD.

FROM THE NERVE-GIVING PRINCIPLES OF THE OX-BRAIN and WHEAT GERM.

VITALIZED PHOSPHITES.—Restores the energy lost by nervousness, weakness or indigestion; relieves lassitude and neuralgia; refreshes the nerves tired by worry, excitement or excessive sensitiveness, and strengthens a failing memory. It aids wonderfully in the mental and bodily growth of infants and children. Under its use the teeth come easier, the bones grow better, the skin smoother, the brain acquires more readily and rests and sleeps more sweetly. An ill fed brain learns no lessons, and is excusable if peevish. It gives a more intellectual and happier childhood. It does away with that feeling of weakness and exhaustion which impels to the use of alcoholic beverages, and directly counteracts a cause of depravity and suffering which has baffled the efforts of religion and morality. Not a secret remedy; formula on every label. For sale by Druggists, or mail, $1.

F. CROSBY CO., 664 and 666, 6th Ave., New York

Miscellaneous Selections.

Call me what you will, I hate alcohol, and I pray God to give me an everlastingly increasing capacity to hate with burning hatred any agency under heaven that can enslave, imbrute, and take away the best part of a man's life, and give him nothing but an awful, black, and fearful recollection to pay for it.—Gough.

"Prohibtiion doesn't prohibit," but the liquor dealers report the falling off of 90,000 barrels in Kansas sales last year from what they sold two years before. They also report an increase of 4,000 barrels in Nebraska. Which prohibits, high license or prohibition?

Dr. Howe, of Massachusetts, says that half the idiots of England come from drunken parents.

There are five hundred magisterial districts in Kentucky where the sale of liquor is prohibited.

A SHORT TEMPERANCE SPEECH.

I do not think it best
To wait till I'm a man,
But sign the temperance pledge
As early as I can.

Let's be teetotal boys
Till we grow up, and then,
'Tis my opinion, with God's help,
We'll be teetotal men!

—o—

Eli Perkins shows how even the best temperance men are financial sufferers, if nothing more, by the existence of the drink traffic. He says: "I paid $425 taxes on my New York house last year. What was this tax used for? It was to govern a city where three-fourths of the arrests were made on account of drunkenness. I can govern myself, but I have to pay $425 a year to be protected from the criminal classes, made criminal through rum."

In Traer (Iowa) the city council posts a list of drunkards in every saloon, and orders the keepers to sell no drinks to them.

BUNYAN'S
Pilgrim's Progress.
A large edition of this intensely interesting and instructive book has been placed at our disposal by the publishers, and we are enabled to offer it to ou subscribers at a wonderfully low price.
The author's biographer, speaking of the circumstances under which this book was written, says:
Although cut off by his protracted confinement from all opportunity of public preaching, he was, in the overruling providence of God, more extensively useful than while in the enjoyment of unfettered liberty; for having during his leisure hours exerted the extraordinary talents with which he was endowed, he produced the Pilgrim's Progress—a work which has been more extensively circulated, and done more good in the world than any other book except the Bible alone."
The great popularity of this book is shown in the fact that it has been translated into every language on the continent of Europe.
It should be in every family. Parents can give no better instruction to their children than by laying before them a copy of this excellent book.
Sunday School and Band of Hope Teachers and Superintendents cannot do better than supply each scholar with a copy.

Signal Notes.

Temple Hotel and its Successes.—In the onward march of temperance reform measures, one of the most practical is the establishment of home-like temperance hotels and cafes. Washington City has one such place in Temple Hotel, 9th street. Rented by its enterprising proprietor before the foundations of the first building were laid, planned and watched over with faith and perseverance, occupied, fitted and furnished three years since, with a valuable addition last winter, it has been truly demonstrated that houses for the accommodation of hundreds of guests may be conducted without the profits accruing from the sale of wine or liquors. Persons of refinement and high literary attainments, such as Miss Willard, Mrs. Alden (Pansy), Mrs. J. Ellen Foster, Mrs. Laura Redden Learing (Howard Glyndon). John Burroughs of "The Century," and many others of earth's nobility, have found congenial quarters there during the present winter. Though high rents are paid, and a suite of attractive parlors are furnished free for use of guests, Temple hotel is a success, and is conducted by a W. C. T. U. woman, the district organization having its headquarters at this place free of any expense whatever.

The drunkard-maker always hates his oldest and most reliable customers, and is proud of cursing and kicking them out. How we should be surprised to hear the shoemaker slam the door against an old customer, and say, "You villainous old scamp, I made boots and shoes for you and your family for twenty years, and you have paid for them, and here you are for more shoes! Get out, and don't let me see your face again." How funny it would look to see a tailor basting an old schoolmate into a gutter, because after getting his clothes there for fifteen years he wants to buy an overcoat. Or a minister assaulting an old standby because he has been twenty-five years a communicant and elder in his church, and therefore must be unfit company for anybody. Isn't it time for drunkards to be ashamed of the drunkard-makers?—Broadaxe.

The crusaders (Catholic) of Minnesota have decided that members frequenting saloons for the purpose of purchasing cigars, billiard-playing, etc., violate their pledge in so doing, and their names will be dropped from the rolls.

The Florida law forbidding the sale of intoxicating liquors except on petition of a majority of the voters of the election district has been declared constitutional by the supreme court of that state.

The liquor traffic and Mormonism must be regulated just as we regulated slavery, which was first voted down and then shot to death.

THE PENOGRAPH.—For more than thirty years inventive genius has industriously labored to produce a perfectly automatic fountain pen. Numerous devices, possessing various degrees of merit, have been patented and extensively sold; and most of them have worked splendidly till one or more of their delicate parts gave out and had to be repaired. But all defects hitherto encountered have been remedied in what is termed the Penograph. In the Penograph all small and complicated contrivances are dispensed with. Although the pen appears to be small it will write just as well as the largest. It is capable of producing the finest hair lines as well as heavy shaded strokes. The pen is of solid gold, first quality diamond pointed. With fair usage it will last a lifetime. The case is vulcanized rubber, handsomely finished. In our opinion the Penograph, as illustrated above, is well calculated to supercede all other writing pens and pencils in daily use. Its flow of ink is automatic and free, but never too profuse. It sheds ink when in use and stops when the pen ceases to move. It needs no wiping and no dipping for ink. It is carried in the pocket always ready for use on any kind of paper. It costs no more than is usually charged for a first class gold pen and holder without the fountain. It is fully warranted and may be returned if it fails to meet the expectations of any person who shall read the above. Price $3, postpaid. An extra pen will be given to any subscriber who shall send us $9 for a club of three Penographs. All postpaid.

We offer the above Penograph as a present to any one sending us four new subscribers at $1 75.

OFFICIAL ORGAN OF THE WOMAN'S NATIONAL CHRISTIAN TEMPERANCE UNION.

"Thou hast given a banner to them that fear Thee; that it may be displayed because of the Truth; that Thy beloved may be delivered."

VOL. X.—NO. 12. CHICAGO, MARCH 20, 1884. $1 75 PER YEAR.

SIR WILFRID LAWSON is authority for the statement that in England no public house (saloon) or beer house has ever been licensed by a working man. Alas! it is not true in this country. The votes of the workingmen of our land are the great power behind the saloon.

JUDGE NOAH DAVIS is a man of plain and direct speech. In the great Chickering Hall temperance meeting he is reported as saying: "Shall I be mealy-mouthed when I speak of such men?" referring to liquor dealers. "By heaven, I will denounce the rascality that sells liquor to men, women and children, with as much violence as God gives me power to utter!" When conscientious men speak out with such vehemence the atmosphere is charged with the electricity of the moral cyclone. Look out for it.

THE soldiers in Her Majesty's Indian service are not allowed to wear the blue ribbon, or any addition to their prescribed uniform, We hear, however, of some ingenious men at Rangoon who have hit upon an expedient for displaying the blue without pinning it upon their bosoms. They simply attach a bit of blue to their walking sticks and in this way show the faith that is in them. A native in Rangoon who wished to don the blue found himself involved in a difficulty of another kind. His broad bosom was covered by nothing save its own rich black complexion, and it would have been rather painful to pin the the ribbon to the naked skin. The poor man, however, was not to be defeated. He quickly tied a string round his arm, and to this was fastened the ribbon which he proudly carried in triumph away. When total abstinence finds a will, it quickly makes a way.

PROHIBITION, or rather the submission of the question to the people has been defeated in the New York legislature by the narrow vote of 91 to 63. A reconsideration was secured, however, so that another attempt will be made to pass the amendment. It will be remembered that the state republican convention last fall promised to give the people a chance to declare themselves upon the matter, and an analysis of the vote shows that of the 61 votes in favor of the amendment, 53 were republican, and 8 democratic. Of the 63 votes against it, 46 were democratic, and 17 republican. Among those who helped the temperance republicans to carry out the pledge of their Richfield platform were eight noble-minded democrats; while seventeen republicans were found who refused to fulfill that pledge, and voted not merely against prohibition, but against even allowing the people to declare their will on the question.

DID you know, good friends who are claiming and championing the revenues of high license as necessary to the prosperity of the city and the town, that you can far better afford to pay every one of the 500,000 saloonists and druggists of our land, $500 to quit the business, than to receive it from them for the support of your local governments? This would amount to only $250,000,000. You can then pay $50,000 to each of the 5,000 distillers and brewers of the country, as a condition of abandonment of the manufacture of liquors, with another $250,000,000 and have still another $250,000,000 left from the annual drink bill of America with which you may yearly reimburse tax-payers for the evils inflicted by the traffic through the term of years during which the government has fostered and protected it. Where are the nation's financiers?

As the reign of King Alcohol nears its close in Iowa it is well to note in memory a few of the figures and statistics of the old regime, for future comparison. In 1880, the record of criminal convictions shows that a little over thirty-five per cent were the cases of saloon-keepers. Now when prohibitory law comes to its estate, it is very likely that the percentage of these convictions will be still larger. Let no man beguile you when that illustrious day shall rise, with the rather trite assertion that prohibition does not prohibit, because of this fact. The figures above quoted are the legetimate result of even the lame prohibitory law which has been in existence for a quarter of a century, and it is because it has been so well enforced that so large a percentage of the convictions have been meted out to offending saloonists. No one is senseless enough to claim that the prohibitory statute just enacted will convert the minds and hearts of the would-be dram-shop keepers. So long as the will to keep a dram-shop exists, so long sinful and criminal endeavors will be made which the law may now most blessedly interdict and crush.

WHEN the captain of the Glaucus saw the wreck of the Columbus he passed quietly on his way, not seeing the poor wretches clinging to the rigging. There was nothing to prevent his going nearer, so that he might have seen these dying men, but it does not seem to have occurred to him to turn a little out of his way to make sure that there were no living beings whose agony he could relieve; he went on undisturbed by the horrors of that dreadful night. That may be sea-faring usage and the way of captains, but it has very much the look of barbarism and cold-blooded savagery. We shudder thinking of it, and wonder if those forsaken ones will not haunt his dreams.

But there is a sea around us as insatiate and as merciless as the Atlantic. Its victims are going down into the bitter wave, dragging the innocent and lovely with them. They are not removed from sight by distance, we cannot say that we do not know of, or see them. We hear the wail of childhood and the drunkard's despairing cry. We see the dreary home and crowded jail. Are we much moved, or do we go on our way, singing and dancing, happy in the last new novel or the most bizarre fashion, delighted with gossip and charmed with our pets?

Let us ask ourselves, are we very different after all from the captain of the Glaucus?

MAINE is still advancing along the line of law enforcement. At Augusta the clergymen of the city and a large number of the best citizens voted for the prohibition candidates at the last election. Upon being warned that such votes would surely throw the offices into the hands of the democrats, some of them replied, "Democratic rum is preferable to Republican rum, not being quite as inconsistent in the case of the Democratic party as in that of great 'moral ideas.'" The situation is the same in Bangor as in Augusta. In the former place there is a growing feeling in favor of the law-abiding principle.

One of our workers visiting a town near Bangor she was told that there was considerable strong drink sold in the place. Being the guest of an intelligent, true hearted man who had studied the situation from all points of view, she asked him about it, and after a moment's thought he said: "You know we have a college here?"

"Yes, sir."

"Well, there isn't a single place where one of the students would think of going, did he want a drink never so much. It certainly is a safe place for them." And then he went on to say: "No doubt there are a few obscure dens where a man with no pride, or some far-gone drunkard might go and find his drink."

This is not total extermination but it may be all we have a right to reasonably expect at this stage of prohibition history; and considering how far the traffic has been driven during the last thirty years in, or rather out of Maine, have we not a right to be getting our trumpets ready to blow at the end of another decade?

A SONG OF HOPE.

BY MRS. JUDGE LANDON.

We sing the time that's coming,
When all who love the Lord
Shall dwell in perfect brotherhood,
And so fulfill the word—
The time when faith and science
Shall radiantly unite,
To span, with fadeless coronal,
The waiting brow of Night.
Coming—coming; the shadows melt apace,
And through the rainbow mists of dawn
Truth lifts her lovely face.

We sing the time that's coming,
When woman, pure and free,
Shall wield the sovereignty of love
In sweet humility—
Shall share her brother's burdens
With heart, and hand and brain,
Till both in garments fair and white,
The mountain top shall gain.
Coming—coming; I hear the fetters fall,
I see the golden gate of day
Swing wide to welcome all!

We sing the time that's coming,
When war shall be no more—
When symphonies of peace shall rise
From happy shore to shore;
When ocean's farthest islet
Shall hear Messiah's voice,
And o'er His last returning sheep
The shepherd shall rejoice.
Coming—coming; sweet friends 'twill not be long!
I note the sweep of hurrying wings—
I catch the seraph's song!

O wondrous day that's coming,
We hail thy herald beams!
Thy rising beauties far outshine
Our fancy's fairest dreams.
O kingdom of the blessed,
O city of the free,
Thou New Jerusalem, come down!
We wait, we long for thee!
Coming—coming; thank God! through rifted skies
Steal down the music and the balm
From fields of paradise.

THE RELATIONSHIP OF THE SUNDAY SCHOOL TO THE BAND OF HOPE.

BY REV. CHARLES GARRETT,
Ex-President British Wesleyan Conference.

What is the relationship that should exist between the Sunday school and the Band of Hope? Shall they be antagonistic, or neutral, or amalgamated? This is a question of immense importance, for they are two mighty and influential organizations. I suppose I shall not be far wrong if I say that the Sunday school has five million scholars, with 700,000 teachers, while there are 10,000 Bands of Hope, with more than a million members. Every one will see that the relationship of these great organizations is a matter in which not only every Christian, but every patriot, is deeply interested. Their antagonism would be an immense calamity. Their neutrality would be an injury to both, while their amalgamation would benefit each, and make them an immense blessing to both the church and the world. Believing this, I am most anxious that every Sunday school teacher should believe it also. I want, therefore, to give a few reasons for my belief, and I pray you look at them without prejudice, and in the fear of God.

For what object does the Sunday school exist? Not merely to keep children out of mischief, and to give employment to teachers who can find no other way of spending the Sunday. Not that we may have great organizations, and large collections, and agreeable tea meetings, but that we may gather the young people around us, and by God's blessing make them good citizens and devout, intelligent and earnest Christians. This is the object that every right minded teacher sets before him, and for this he lives, and labors, and prays. Whatever is accomplished, if this is not done, the school is a failure; and whatever is not done, if this is accomplished, the school is a success. Thank God, in innumerable cases this has been accomplished, and the devoted teacher has been able to say, with holy joy, as he has looked at many on earth, and others in heaven, "For what is our hope, or joy, or crown of rejoicing? Are not even ye in the presence of our Lord Jesus Christ at His coming? For ye are our glory and our joy." But what of many others? Alas! their history may be written in tears and blood. Let any teacher examine the register of his school twenty or thirty years ago, and then carefully inquire after the history of the names recorded there, and if he writes the record, it will be like the prophet's roll, written within and without, with mourning, lamentation and woe. Some will be found to be "walking in the counsel of the ungodly," others "standing in the way of sinners," others "sitting in the seat of the scorner," some in the betting ring, some outcasts, some in prison, some transported, and some gone to an early and unhonored grave. In their case the teacher has labored in vain, and has spent his strength for nought. If he is a wise man, will he not endeavor to ascertain the cause of this destruction? And if a sensible right hearted teacher, will he not be prepared for any sacrifice and toil, if, by God's grace, he may preserve the children still in the school from falling victims to the same destroyer? If so, I think there will be no hesitation as to the decision of this meeting, and of the teachers whom you represent. I know there are many evil agencies in operation to promote this destruction, but there are a host of witnesses to testify that the giant evil is strong drink. This assists and intensifies all the other agencies, and at the same time exerts an influence peculiarly its own. I will not quote instances, for they are innumerable. I should insult you if I were thus to hint that you doubted that which is patent to all. The great question for you is, will the incorporation of total abstinence with the Sunday school lessen this destruction, and make it more efficient for its great work?

As to children taking intoxicating drinks, the medical world unites in testifying that for young people, at least, they are not only unnecessary, but absolutely injurious. That, as Sir William Gull says, "They spoil their health and injure their intellect," and it is also equally certain that it is fearfully injurious to their moral nature. Years ago an aged and eminent man remarked, "If there is a particle of depravity in a man's heart a glass of brandy will find it out, and stir it up." And what is true of brandy, is true of alcohol in every shape. From the time of Noah till this day its effects have shown that it has an affinity for the worst part of our nature. Hence we cannot be too careful in guarding young people against it, and as Sunday school teachers are especially devoted to the instruction and training of young people, the Band of Hope movement has a special claim upon their sympathy and co-operation. Leaving, therefore, the question of the danger of children taking intoxicating drink, I want to show you the great advantage which will result from the Sunday school and Band of Hope being incorporated—from the Band of Hope being not a mere accidental appendage, depending for its very existence upon some one outside of the school, but its becoming an integral part of the Sunday school organization, as completely so as the mission society, or library.

Let me name a few results of this union. First, it will be an immense benefit to the Band of Hope movement. This movement has made wonderful progress in spite of the apathy of some, and the hostility of others. In many cases, the Band of Hope has existed outside the school, and too often outside the church. It has been an orphan uncared for and untrained. The natural result of this has been that it has sometimes said and done things that it never would have said and done if it had been more kindly treated. This, however, has been its misfortune rather than its fault. With all its defects and faults it is a fine healthy child, and if the Sunday school will but adopt it, and give it its place among the children, its faults will soon be cured, and its defects remedied; placed in such a beautiful home, its strength will be fully developed, it will throw its protecting arm around the children, and our country will soon become as sober as she is free.

Look also at the many benefits which this union will confer on the Sunday schools. These seem to me to be so many and so great that I can barely name a few of them. First, it will infuse new vigor into the work of the school. Without this there is necessarily a great deal that is monotonous, a great deal that taxes the patience of the children, and a great deal that is confined to the Sunday. Now we all know that children are naturally active. They must be doing, and if they haven't something good to do they will be doing evil. The children's poet says that "Satan finds some mischief still for idle hands to do." With all respect to the writer, I think Satan might spare his pains, for the children will find it for themselves. It is, therefore, our wisdom to keep them from the temptation, and employ them in something useful and good. This is no easy task, for they get through their work so rapidly, that they will tax all our ingenuity to keep them employed. Many teachers forget this, and coerce the school into a state of order that destroys its efficiency; while other teachers, whose physical force is not so well developed, and who are not such martinets, allow the school to degenerate into a Babel. It is in a chronic state of disorder, and the happiest moment of the superintendent and teachers is when the school closes, especially if it closes without a storm. All this arises from ignoring, or endeavoring to repress, the God-given activity of the children. Set them to work, and especially set them to work on something which they can understand, and in which they are interested, and all this discord and confusion will speedily be remedied.

A temperance organization in the school will provide just what is needed. The teachers and scholars will soon be united in the sympathy which arises from being engaged in a common work. They will soon begin to understand and appreciate each other more highly. It will provide work for all, and give each the work for which he is best fitted. There will be meetings arranged for, songs to be sung, recitations to be given, absentees to seek, adherents to gain. Thus every one will be actively employed, and each will have the joyous consciousness that he is not living in vain, but that he is taking his part in the noble work of delivering his country from its greatest foe. Besides this, the school would not be content with merely holding meetings, but, as is the case in all well-managed Bands of Hope, would organize a literature department, the scholars being encouraged to attempt the sale of books and periodicals. These being obtained at wholesale prices, will leave a good margin of profit, and the whole amount made by each scholar being given to him in some useful form at the end of the year, will form a powerful stimulus to industry. The books thus earned will form the nucleus of a good library, a library that may be of immense value both to them and those with whom they are associated. This is not a mere theory. I know of one Wesleyan Band of Hope in a poor neighborhood that sells as many as forty thousand books and periodicals per annum. The value of such a work as this is beyond computation. For not only is a vast amount of pure literature spread where it is greatly needed, but right habits are formed by the litte tradespeople, and the whole school is strengthened by the result. Such an arrangement as this in every school would soon turn the whole army of Sunday school scholars into home missionaries and colporteurs, and would exert a mighty purifying and educating influence upon the population of the country.

SHORT TEMPERANCE TALKS. NO. III.

BY MISS C. S. BURNETT.

No. 3.—Some of the mistakes they make.

By they I mean the men who in any way are engaged in the liquor traffic. It is a mistake to suppose that the money for which no equivalent is given can ever bless them or their families. "It is the price of blood." It is a mistake to suppose that the sighs and prayers of the widowed mother and worse than widowed drunkard's wife which daily enter the court of heaven are unheard and will be unheeded. "Vengeance is mine; I will repay saith the Lord." Retribution may seem slow but it is sure. "Thou art weighed in the balance and found wanting," is written against every one of these workers of iniquity.

They make a mistake when they think that the law-abiding American citizen will forever sit still and see the debased from other lands come here and fasten upon us, in spite of law, the vices which caused the poverty and degradation in the homes they left. It is right that America should stretch out her arms to welcome all the oppressed of other lands but she should say "Leave behind you that which caused your oppression. If you cannot do this stay away. If you who are here do not like Sunday laws you are free to go back to the land where lager beer and potato whisky flow free to your destruction." It is a mistake to suppose that our 7,000,000 voters will be forever held in the clutches of the 500,000 men who are engaged in the rum traffic. The money which has ruined our homes will not always purchase votes enough to hold "the balance of power." The whisky power made a mistake, so far as it is concerned, when it declared "We will vote only for such men and measures as will support our cause." They placed temperance in politics, not the temperance people. We are only meeting them on their own ground. They fight for, we against, but there is yet the vast army that stand between and do not want to help either side. They want the whisky power controlled but also want their vote. The vote of this class is a curse rather than a help to any party. It is a mistake to suppose that the present order of things is going to last. Because men now defy law is no reason why they should always do so. God's Word says, "Woe to him that putteth the bottle to his neighbor's lips." It is a mistake to suppose that this woe so often denounced shall not finally overtake the evil doer. Sin is always a mistake.

"ALL THINGS ARE YOURS."

BY MRS. ESTHER T. HOUSH,
Editor of Woman at Work.

One evening last autumn I climbed to the top of a hill in the midst of this lovely village. Under my feet were timeworn rocks, covered with gray moss and bordered with sumach leaves glowing with the fire of the faded summer. Before me lay the majestic guardian of the town, Wantastiquet, looking benignly on the hills that circled the horizon, looking over them to the hills and valleys beyond, and away and up to the light clouds bathing themselves in the gold and rose, the amber and flame of the steting sun. All the trees had on the gala robes of the year; crimson and orange in myriad shades outlined the course of the brook and dappled the green hills with lines of plumes and torches and banners until their hues were lost in the blue of the sky. Not fairer was the promised land to the eyes of him that beheld it from Mount Nebo!

There are thoughts in the lowlands that seem hedged about of ourselves, human, that on the hill top seem inspirations beyond us of God. Words that have been almost meaningless become freighted with a power that baffles description. It was thus in the midst of this wonderful beauty that the message of a dear friend seemed borne to me with an uplifting of understanding I had not known before: "'All things are yours,' says the word. Labor is yours, tribulation is yours, triumph is yours."

What a wealth of possession! Not in deeds or bonds, not in treasure, that moth or rust can corrupt, or thieves break through and steal, not in wood or hay or stubble that the floods can destroy or flames consume, but yours by the eternal word of Him whose the world is, and for whose glory we were created. "All things are yours!" Measureless height! Fathomless depth! Boundless breadth! Infinite riches! Dower of the sons and daughters of a King whose throne is from everlasting to everlasting! Promise and pledge to each loyal child! And as I thought of those who should inherit this reward I remembered with a thrill of joy the precious band of the earth's workers, around whom cluster everything good and true and pure, the W. C. T. U. In woman is all humanity represented, the humanity for which Christ died, for which He lives, and to whom is His sacred promise, "All things are yours!" In mental review came these hosts of earnest Christian women up from the valleys of silence, up from the lower interpretation of the law, out from narrow creeds to the largeness of the gospel; coming through the fields they had planted, bringing the sheaves they had gathered with the song of labor on their lips and the garlands of victory on their brows; coming up the hillside a glad triumphal band bearing the banner of "For God and home and native land." And the memory of what had been won, the battles fought, first with self, then with the world, the consecration and union, the devotion and truth, the heroism and strength born of woman's love and faith lifted the hillside to a mountain top that compassed the world, and the voice of the message to fill all space with, "All things are yours!"

At that moment of revelation the glow of the setting sun rested on the summit of the mountain before me like a halo of benediction, then faded away. The shadows fell, the beauty fled, but the message I send to you, dear sisters of the W. C. T. U., it is our promise.

"Labor is yours." Without arrogating to ourselves any praise, by the providence of God, woman is today called to a larger field of labor than she ever filled before. It is supplemental work to much that has been done, adding to the good work of man. It is complemental, in that it brings beauty and harmony where crudeness and discord prevailed. It is not only labor in the home for the home, but labor in the world for the home. This labor is prompted by the great heart of motherhood reaching out to the homeless, the uncared for, the untaught, the weak, the tempted, the erring. The labor is itself love, going down into the slums of the cities, up dark stairs, into byways and highways, seeking the lost. In its eager grasp it holds as a sacred trust the coming generations whose feet shall find a straighter path for their treading. To its resistless plea the nation bends a listening ear; its power is undermining the very stronghold of evil. There is no place in all our broad land where the influence of this love has not gone. Under its searching power, governments are questioning if what is is right; churches are filled with a true spirit of the Master; schools are coming to know "the greatest study of mankind is man," and that to "know thyself" is more important than all other knowledge, and homes are finding the hearts within. It is a labor of love, because love has labored. But love has also suffered. Take alone the 3,000 local organizations of the W. C. T. U., and in every one from ten to a hundred heroes. Who are heroes? They who know the truth and are not afraid to speak it; they know how the right and are not afraid to do it. It means a good deal to belong to our band in some places. It means a good deal more to have the spirit of the Master and to be willing to follow where He leads. It means labor, tribulation, and triumph. In very fact the first two of these cannot be separated. "In the world ye shall have tribulation, but be of good cheer, I have overcome the world."

To the woman leaving the allotted fields of life the way seems rugged and weary. Much of duty doing is cross bearing. The gospel temperance meetings have been ample witness to this. One woman I knew, a little timid, shrinking creature, full of faith but also full of fear. The minister called for volunteers to take the pledge down the aisles among the men, bloated, blear-eyed, whisky-numbed that filled the lower part of the church. Something told her to go. "Oh, Lord," she cried, "I am a woman, a wife, a mother, don't send me!" Still she was bidden to go. Not daring to disobey she started down the aisle. "It was as if a thousand needles were in my feet," she said, "and when I looked up at those great strong men I seemed such a child beside them, yet all at once with a rush of sympathy for the wives and children of these drunken husbands and fathers, I knew why I, a wife and mother was sent." Since that time thousands have learned from her the way of life. She carried the cross until its light filled her face, and labor and tribulation was lost in triumph.

No one sails to heaven on "flowery beds of ease." We should be weak Christians if we did. All the promises are to those who overcome. Out of the depths of tribulation shall come the white robes of rejoicing. But while bearing the burden and enduring the sorrow we must not forget that triumph is ours. We know the broader work, the better work of these later years must grow into wonderful results for the future. And is He not true who has said "He that goeeth forth and weepeth, bearing precious seed, shall doubtless come again with rejoicing, bringing his sheaves with him"?

Enlisting in the service of God and humanity may mean treading narrow paths, climbing steep hillsides, crossing dangerous passes, walking in darkness and perplexity and through tribulation, until in the blessedness of overcoming the trial shall mean joy; but the path of duty, whether it leads by the home door, or out in a rough, untrodden world, leads to one goal, triumph—and to the possession of the promised inheritance, for "All things are yours."

WHAT BECAME OF THE TRAMPS.

BY SARAH K. BOLTON.

"Going over to the meeting tonight? Very important business to be attended to. The country is getting full of lazy tramps who won't work, and can't get it I suppose, if they would. The work-house must be enlarged right away, and already the taxes are dreadful." The above remarks were made by a politician who was going to hear an address by Mr. Grandison, councilman from the ninth ward of the city of Haverland.

This city of forty-thousand people had a Woman's Christian Association, Girl's Reformatory, Home for the Aged, relief societies for the poor, a Woman's Temperance Union to look after the product of four hundred saloons, and yet the number of tramps increased.

Mr. Grandison was the chief speaker at the meeting. He had long been desirous to represent the city in the legislature, and to do this he must keep himself before the people, and upon some burning theme. The tramp question had indeed become an important matter. Mr. Grandison was a pompous but suave man, who by a turn of the wheel of fortune had become reduced to poverty. His wife put on her accustomed airs, and by dint of opportune calls upon her neighbors, (at meal time,) and sending the children to friends for long visits, her family managed to subsist. She was an officer in as many benevolent societies as possible, for she had high hopes for the future.

Mr. Grandison spoke well on the evening above mentioned. The tramps were punished severely for being without work, and their parents before them, for allowing them to become tramps. Of course compulsory education and the compulsory learning of some trade were suggested as remedies. Reading rooms were urged where men might sit in comfort, away from temptation. The Woman's Temperance Union had already begged books and money, and given ten cent entertainments, till the people were tired of the very name of "reading-room." Capitalists were urged to provide workshops, but the principle of self-preservation governs saints and sinners alike. Capital will not squander itself, with no return of income. A benevolent society might buy land at the far west, and loan money to build homes, but the tramps would not go. Finally an Agricultural Reform Farm was attempted, where drunkards should stay till they were cured, and vagrants till they loved work; but still the tramps increased in number.

Taxes were growing more burdensome. The times were hard, and the worthy poor were without work. The cry of "economy and retrenchment" was raised. This cry usually reaches the public schools first. Some persons seem to feel that what we need least is brains. Teachers, most of them women, and therefore having no votes in the coming election for legislators, were at once cut down in salaries, Then the high schools were dispensed with. In vain did some protest that fifty per cent of those who attended were the children of working men, who would otherwise have no opportunity to reach high positions in life; that the greatness and glory of the republic depends largely upon education. The Public Library was closed; the place where tired men had gathered to read the papers, and forget for a few minutes the struggle for daily bread.

Next the churches were taxed. True, they were built largely by the self-sacrifice of the few for the ennobling of the many, but the money was needed for jails and workhouses.

Mr. Grandison, who had helped to bring about all this economy, was rewarded by a place in the legislature. His wife was proud and satisfied, no not that exactly, for when were a politician or his wife ever satisfied unless the presidential chair were reached. And now what perplexed and amazed everybody was the fact that there were more tramps than ever.

Mrs. Grandison received an early call one morning. She was wanted at once at the jail. She had often been there in her benevolent work, and yet could not divine the present urgent request. She hastened down, and was brought face to face with a strange scene. Her two sons—wild boys they had been, but she loved them—in a drunken quarrel had killed a man! Her boys, whom she had petted and spoiled! She was completely prostrated, and the father was at once called. Then a new truth forced itself upon him; he saw what made tramps and murders; what made taxes burdensome and people poor; the four hundred saloons of Haverland. These two sons whom he idolized had been ruined by the very haunts of sin which the law caressed and protected. Both sons paid the penalty of a broken law, a law which allows "HELPS TO MURDER," placed along every pathway, and then hangs those who commit murder. Mrs. Grandison did as other mothers have done; lay down in her grave, broken-hearted in her prime.

Not so her husband. All the forces of his nature were stirred within him. He showed the people of Haverland how they helped to support men who were tearing down the purity and honor of the community by their business; how mothers were crushed and wives ruined by the dreadful traffic. Stealing and murder were prohibited; why not also their prime cause? The church and the women became doubly in earnest. Politicians were proud to be on the right side, when that seemed the winning side.

The police were glad to enforce the law if they were sure of being sustained in, and not lose their positions. The need of daily bread makes a man very careful about his principles if he have any. As usual when good men and women are united in doing a thing, evil is overcome. Haverland closed its saloons. Of course there were some would drink in cellars, and by way of back doors, and paid death his bill when he came early, as he always did, but the "Tramp Question" was settled. These do not grow where there are no saloons, nor remain when saloons are closed. Hon. Mr. Grandison did the best work of his life in this act, and was rewarded by higher political positions.

OUR YOUNG WOMEN AGAIN.

DEAR UNION SIGNAL:—I have been wishing for some time that we could learn through the columns of THE UNION SIGNAL more about the work of the Y. W. C. T. U's scattered over the country. I was very glad to find in your issue of Feb. 29, a beginning of the fulfillment of my wish in the communications from Rose E. Patten and Mary Whitall Smith of Philadelphia.

In our union of the South Side Chicago, we have always made social influence a very strong point,—a part of temperance work which I feel I cannot too strongly urge upon the Y. W. C. T. U's everywhere.

For the benefit of other unions, from which I often receive letters of inquiry, I want to give briefly our plan for the advancement of total abstinence and the promotion of good fellowship, etc., in a social way. Our union begins a series of socials each year, the second Thursday in October, which are continued the same evening of each month until May or June, closing with a lawn party or picnic in July. The socials take place at the residence of members of the union according to invitation. Refreshments are furnished by the union. A committee of five ladies and five gentlemen are appointed each month at our business meetings, by the president, to have charge of entertainment and refreshments. Each member has the privilege of inviting a guest. During the evening the guests are given an opportunity of signing the pledge and joining the union. The gentlemen paying one dollar and the ladies fifty cents. These are our annual fees.

Our last social occurred on St. Valentine's eve. The committee, with quick recognition of the "fitness of things," made valentines the feature of the evening. All cards of notification to the members bore the the request that each one should bring a valentine, "original preferred." The result was that the hat box which was placed in the hall for their reception, was almost filled with a variety of wise, witty, sentimental, and pretty valentines, some of them being beautifully designed, painted and written by the young ladies themselves. These, with recitations and music and a three minutes paper by one of our honorary members answering the question "Is prohibition a success?" afforded very pleasant entertainment for the evening. Five new members were added to our roll and several others took the subject under consideration. I want to say en passant that dancing at our socials has been prohibited by a unanimous vote of the union—the voters included the gentlemen.

A program at one of the socials this winter which gave much pleasure consisted of P. P. Bliss' little operetta "The Professor at Home," and tableaux from "The Hanging of the Crane," accompanied by readings from the poem.

At our next social one of the young ladies will answer the following question in a three minutes paper, "Why is it necessary for temperance people to sign a total abstinence pledge?" There will be vocal and instrumental music and recitations; then we shall all proceed to the kitchen and dining room of our hostess where a man sent from a confectioner's will have made everything ready for the young men and maidens to indulge in the old-fashioned sport of "candy pulling." And a great bowl of lemonade on the table will prove an acceptable acid to neutralize so much sweet. Thus saith the committee.

These monthly socials have been largely the means of the increase in our membership. In this way is our influence constantly going out into society. At one of our recent socials, a young gentlemen who was asked to join our union hesitated a few moments over the pledge and then wrote his name. A few evenings afterward he said to one of our young ladies: "I went to a banquet the evening following the social, where one other gentleman and myself were all who turned their glasses down. Had the banquet occurred the evening before I should have taken the wine." An invitation from a young lady to the social followed by a presentation of the pledge made the difference between a man squarely committed to the right, and one thoughtlessly letting his influence swell the tide of wrong.

One of our young gentlemen carries an autograph pledge book in his pocket, and presents it as occasion offers to his business acquaintances for their signatures. "I feel now that I have had some influence since I joined the union," said a young man to me, "in dissuading where once I was persuaded when the 'social glass' was offered."

Numerous cases of this kind have come under my notice, where thought has been arrested, interest awakened, and a staunch reformer made through the socials of the Y. W. C. T. U. Is it any wonder then that I insist so strongly upon the continual observance of this part of our work? Don't overlook the socials! Have them at regular intervals; make them as pleasant as possible; vary the entertainment; always have some simple refreshments— coffee and cake, ice cream and cake, etc.; and always have enough temperance leaven in the program "to leaven the whole lump." You know a very little leaven, if of the right strength, works wonders.

I want to say a few words about the young ladies before I close. Some of our best, most efficient workers have become interested first through our socials. Others, who for various reasons, cannot give their time and strength to the work, can and do carry this blessed temperance gospel with them wherever they are, no less on shipboard, or in France, Italy, Germany, etc., than in their own country and in their own homes.

Do not think because I seem to exalt this social phase of our work that I underestimate the importance of other branches. I know the best life of an organization comes from the work it has to do. Exercise is a law of growth. But whether our specific work be Bands of Hope, kindergartens, reading rooms, industrial schools, or kitchen-gardens, we have always found that we received valuable recruits from our socials, and certainly in no other way can we so easily reach the young men and women in society.

Since writing the foregoing, THE UNION SIGNAL of March 6, has come with its wise and timely editorial for the Y. W. C. T. U. May God bless the words so fitly spoken for our upbuilding. In the glow of its inspiration I feel like subscribing myself with renewed emphasis. Yours gratefully, FANNIE C. JONES.

Pres. Y. W. C T. U. South Side, Chicago.

UNFERMENTED WINE AT THE LORD'S TABLE.

DEAR UNION SIGNAL:—In addition to the reason which you give for avoiding the use of fermented wine at the Lord's Supper, that it may lead some reformed man to fall again into his evil habits in a reason which, for me, has been underscored in blood, from the fact that one Sabbath evening I sat by the side of a church member, who, after a terrible experience as a drunkard, had been reformed and had lived an earnest Christian life for months, but had that day, by a taste of fermented wine at the communion, fallen again, a fall from which I think he never recovered. Besides that reason, which ought to be sufficient, on the principle of Paul, that if anything causes a brother to offend it should be avoided, there are two other reasons not commonly given, which your earnest ladies might use with their pastors and church officers. One of these is, that by the use of fermented wine the church is compelled to patronize the rum seller in the purchase of its supplies, which is certainly no small objection.

But what I wish especially to emphasize in answer to the stock argument against the use of unfermented wine, that the wine which Christ used was probably fermented is, that the fermented wine used at the Lord's table in these days is in most cases probably not wine, but alcohol doctored, not containing, in many cases, any of the "fruit of the vine" to which Christ refers at the first Lord's Supper.

The recent trouble with Germany with regard to American pork has brought out in the way of retaliation the fact stated in dispatches to the New York Herald that the German wine exported to America is for the most part adulterated or manufactured, and the same fact has been attested by one of our consuls in France in regard to the adulteration of French wines even at the vineyards. It is well known to those familiar with the tricks of the rum trade that a box of prepared drugs is sold to rum sellers by which they can make any kind of foreign or native wine by adding to alcohol a certain amount of drugs. In view of these facts, there is not the slightest probability that one church in a thousand which make it a plea for using fermented wine, that such wine was probably used by our Lord, really uses wine at all. In purchasing unfermented wine from Christian and temperance stores where it is supplied, one is at least sure of getting the fruit of the vine, and something which will not destroy the Christian life of any of those who partake of it, nor do we then encourage the rum traffic by our patronage.

This is not written to meet those who take the ground that there is but one kind of wine mentioned in the Scriptures. Personally, however, I believe there were two kinds of wine, the reference to the new wine in old bottles, seeming to me to be conclusive. It must be unfermented wine which is there called new wine, because its fermentation is that which is to burst the "bottles." But, whether one kind of wine or two be referred to in the Bible, the argument for unfermented wine at the Lord's table in our day, stands in either case. Christ did not proclaim an anti-slavery crusade, for the times were not then ripe for it; for the same reason He did not inaugurate a temperance crusade. To these two great reforms His thoughts were doubtless turning when He said to His disciples, "I have many things to say unto you, but ye cannot bear them now." Those two movements were to be left as chapters of the newest testament that was to follow the new when people were able to receive it, as the new had followed the old. One can no more defend the use of intoxicating drinks because Christ did not denounce them, than he can defend slavery because Christ did not condemn and prohibit that. The principles of the Bible in every land where it has become the text-book of religion have abolished slavery, the principles of that same book as they are applied to society will also abolish, among Christians at least, all use of intoxicating drinks.

THE WORKSHOP.—NO. IV.

Commend me to the methods of the West Virginia W. C. T. U. After vain endeavors to secure help from outside, they have, like the old farmer of the fable, concluded to reap the white harvest themselves. Therefore under the leadership of their president, Miss Taylor, of Wheeling and her right hand coadjutor Mrs. Jane A. Johnson, of Parkersburg, they have begun the work. I quote from a note just received from the latter, one of the royal women who help to make the world a pleasant place to live in:

"Congratulate me, West Virginia begins to move. 'Hints and Helps,' juvenile literature, etc., have been ordered, sufficient for purposes of organizing. Miss Emma Fowler, our corresponding secretary, who heartily responds to every call, will come to our city next week, and with aid of copygram and denominational minutes, we will ask the co-operation of pastors at all important points in planning for the reception of our corresponding secretary and other workers who come into their midst to organize the W. C. T. U. This is our plan:

"Secure co-operations of pastors, send helps to some earnest intelligent wise temperance woman. Have her read and hand to other workers; plan for a public meeting to be preceded by a special prayer meeting of those interested, say at the parsonage; plan for the reception and entertainment of our corresponding secretary (who by the way is just the woman for the work). Advertise the mass meeting through the papers and pulpit. Secure good music, three or four pointed pithy ten minute talks by the spiciest speakers of the town, one of which, is to pave the way for Miss Fowler to advance and present the cause of the W. C. T. U. After which a collection for state work will be taken and announce that the next day an organization will be effected.

"I shall send off with this, letters to several of our prominent temperance men of wealth, asking contributions to carry on this work."

Dear sisters in the partially organized states, is not this plan practicable for you? Miss Fowler does not profess to be a speaker yet (though I predict she will be one) but a quiet worker whose earnestness and zeal make her willing to go forth on this errand of mercy and hope.

—Our national superintendent of work at state and county fairs, Mrs. Josephine R. Nichols, of Indianapolis, reports that out of ninety-two counties in her state, only one allows the sale of intoxicants at its annual fair. Philo Parsons, Esq., president of Michigan agriculturical society, has used his large influence effectively in securing the banishment of poisonous drinks from the great festival of the people in that state. What a grievous contrast is that reported from Wisconsin where the state officers replied to our Mrs. Bascom (wife of the philosophic Dr. John Bascom), that license being the law of the state they could not well prevent the sale. Would that my honored father, who was for years president of Wisconsin agricultural society, might have had that noble woman's request preferred to him! Sisters of the Badger State, "let us do valiantly for our people" and to the unjust judges "dressed in a little brief authority" let us return until by our continued coming they grow weary.

—A town in Michigan reports a "prohibition concert" held on Sabbath night. Will not the W. C. T. U. send on the program? This is a new form of home missionary work.

—Mrs. M. Helen Crane, of Asbury Park, N. J., sends to our "workshop" an attractive and timely leaflet, "How to Conduct the Regular Weekly Meeting." Presidents of local unions will do well to enclose stamps and secure these hints and helps. Mrs. Crane is widow of the well known Rev. Dr. J. T. Crane, and sister of the late Bishop Jesse T. Peck. She comes of a clear-headed line.

—Mrs. Laura G. Fixen has issued a song leaflet of ten most available hymns, just the thing to distribute to a temperance audience and ensuring hearty congregational singing. It also advertises all the chief temperance papers. Note especially a clarion prohibition song to the tune of "Scots wha hae wi' Wallace bled." Sing this just before your speaker begins if you want her words raised to the highest power of which she is capable. Miss Effie Kilbourne, office UNION SIGNAL, sends this leaflet for $3 per thousand.

—Here are some suggestive extracts from letters:

DEAR MADAM:—I feel as if I would shirk a duty, if I did not put in a plea for the unfortunates called morphine takers. Can you not have some of the able ladies, when addressing their different audiences, urge upon our physicians not to use the miserable drug? Just at present, I have under my care, a person, highly educated, fit to adorn any society but I have been obliged to place her in a retreat because of drunkenness, not from a liquid but a solid; morphine.

I can cite you to many in our city who are as much drunkards as though they visited the rum-shops daily.

Do encourage your ladies to drop earnest appeals against physicians using the drug to such an extent, for in almost every case, a taste was contracted, by an effort to alleviate pain. Drunkenness from the drug, is so much more damaging than from liquor, it in every case leads its victim to debauchery, and not one case in five hundred has will power to stop.

I hope you will pardon my presumption, but I must tell you how I felt one day last week while I sat and heard the question discussed of our little folks being taught prohibition in the schools. We all know that early impressions are lasting ones. Why wait to teach this great truth of prohibition to our public school children? Why not begin with the little kindergartener? They are like putty in our hands, and at three years old object lessons can be given them, and sewed by their little fingers upon card board, and while sewing it on that card the lesson will be sewed as well on the brain, where no time can obliterate it.

The child carries home that same little card, shows it to papa and mamma. We are certain of three getting that lesson, and, perchance many more. Then we must remember our charity kindergartens comprise those who most need teaching in that direction.

Hoping everything for your good work, I remain, most respectfully, MRS. E. C. PRESTON.
Detroit.

From Georgia: "I am convinced that now when we know it is popular to provide for the colored people we of the south ought to turn our attention to a dangerous class growing up among us, the poor whites, who are Anglo-Saxons with all the vices of civilization and without its enlightenment. To better the condition of the women and girls of this class Miss Laura Haygood (sister of Atticus Ga.) called a meeting of the benevolent ladies of all the different religious denominations. She suggested an industrial school to teach these people how to work. She also asked if any one could tell her of the practical workings of the kitchen garden. Very few present were members of our W. C. T. U. here in Atlanta, but one of us stated that our 'National' made kitchen garden work a department and offered to 'get the documents.' Since then a helpful letter has come from Miss McClees, of Yonkers, N. Y., National superintendent of this work."

—"Is not Ohio now the banner state? We have about six hundred local unions?"

—"Florida is organizing rapidly."

—"Miss Henrietta G. Moore is a most unqualified success. She has the refinement of manner indispensable to a pioneer in the south, and combines the strength of a man's logic with the tenderness of a woman's heart. Her very voice pleads. She is organizing in all the leading towns of Alabama. Fortunate is the National in such a representative."

—"Mrs. Chapin has had such a campaign—spoke fourteen times in five days, and formed five unions, some of them one hundred strong. Mrs. Sibley went with her to two places—they were all in Georgia. Mrs. Beauchamp is working up a fine campaign in Texas. The Gadsden (Ala.) Band of Hope sent Mrs. Chapin a lovely satin banner by way of a 'valentine.' No more heroic worker is in our ranks than Sallie F. Chapin, and none more loyal to the National W. C. T. U."

Mrs. "New Hampshire Knox" has been out on a temperance tour. She was away from home one week and spoke ten times. Eleven new unions in her state since the Detroit convention.

—Mrs. Ellen Watson, of Pennsylvania, writes of "twenty-four new unions since the middle of October." "Florida has a baker's dozen since Christmas, thanks to the active president, Mrs. Walter Gwynn. Their late convention (Mesdames Chapin, H. W. Smith and Mary L. Dickinson present) was a great encouragement."

—"February 27, Olympia, Washington Ter. I send you a few flowers from my garden, grown in the open air. The bees were gathering honey from them as I passed. They will help to rectify your ideas of our climate."

Think of that! But Puget Sound is to be the center of our most delightful climate and most glorious civilization. The metropolis of all nations will yet stand upon its shores.

—"Mrs. C. H. St. John, of Denver, Col., (well known in Illinois 'home protection' annals as 'the country parson's wife,") is going to Washington, D. C., as a delegate to the Good Templars' highest council."

—"Mrs. Shields, of Colorado, is our 'temperance Great Heart.' She holds district conventions and visits the local unions constantly, spends the first Sunday of March with our women in Leadville. Her heart is in the Utah work, and if we could pay her expenses there and back, she would take her own risks in attempting to plant our society all through that territory. Would that some business man would furnish the wherewithal for this endeavor! The W. C. T. U. can be a mighty force in helping peaceably to settle the mooted Mormon question."

—"There is a great stir here in Washington (D. C.) The Sabbath afternoon meetings of the W. C. T. U. are crowded. Members of congress are speaking for us and bravely helping on our work. This is something new."

—Oil City Y. W. C. T. U. writes (through its president:)

"We have one gold pencil in answer to Miss Willard's call in THE UNION SIGNAL, and hope we may have more pretty things. We read the letter at our last meeting; are to examine their stock of 'pretties' and report."

—Mrs. L. N. Pease, our new state president, writes from beautiful Asheville, N. C., surrounded by sixty peaks, each as high as Mt. Washington:

"I have urged Mrs. Chapin to come to us. Am now awaiting a letter of advice and instruction from her. Mrs. Huntley, of Greensboro, N. C., our corresponding secretary, who is very earnest and efficient, will also, by my request, correspond with Miss H. G. Moore, asking her to visit the eastern part of the state before warm weather render this impracticable."

—Mrs. Cornelius, president of Arkansas, announces their convention date: May 14, Forrest City.

—Mrs. Judge Brown, president of Wyoming W. C. T. U., writes:

"Our society presented a petition for local option to the legislature, but we fear it will not pass."

It did not. Women constitute but one-fifth of the population, and do not yet hold the balance of voting power. When I asked a leading man in that territory last August, "Why do you not have prohibition?" he replied, "We have not yet women enough to give us the majority."

—One of our leaders writes after this incendiary sort:

"I think our entire system of juvenile temperance work needs renovating. I would change name, pledge, motto and badge."

—Some one also suggests clubs for the "big boys" who will not attend the Band of Hope and are too young for the Y. W. C. T. U. Why not call them the "F. V.s," "Future Voters," or the "Young Patriots;" and train them not alone to total abstinence but in the principles of government? We have too much neglected to train the on-coming voters in the prohibition argument.

—At Mrs. Hagans' recent convention in Joliet, Ill., Mrs. C. W. Lumry of Wheaton, made the best talk about THE UNION SIGNAL I have yet heard. She likened our work to that of a great marching army and called our paper the "supply train," with food and ammunition, amplifying most ingeniously on each. She said it was both education for the public and inspiration to the worker; you could always tell a thorough-going W. C. T. U. woman by her interest in the paper. Sure enough, what would one think of a politician who never reads his party paper or a church member who did not care for the organ of his denomination? She thought that haggling over the price, $1.50 for fifty-two numbers of sixteen pages each, was like scolding the postmaster because you had to pay for the extra stamp on an over-weight letter from home. I have only outlined her breezy talk, the best result of which was seen in the zeal of delegates to subscribe and "renew."

—The "Handbook of Prohibition," by Rev. Dr. A. J. Jutkins, corresponding secretary of "P. H. P. P.," (87 Washington street. Chicago,) is a book that should be in the hands of every W. C. T. U. woman in the land. It is fresh and attractive in style and available in contents. Mrs. Jennie Eggleston Zimmerman has the best brief history of our work ever yet given. It is just the thing to read at a public meeting. Send twenty-five cents and get the "handbook."

—The compliments our workers pay each other sometimes before audiences are amusingly caricatured in the following excerpt from a "dream of fair women," which "Little Opportune" (an alias for A. G.) rehearsed to me this morning. She dreamed she was in the midst of a certain state convention and introductions were the order of the day. A leading worker was brought forward, the delegates rising in recognition, as our custom is, and the presiding officer thus complimenting the lady presented: "Beloved sisters, she is truly remarkable, she is full of longitude, and at the same time permeated with all the latitude there is." ## LILLY'S QUESTION.

BY ALBERT HUTCHINSON.

I take my seat at eventide.
And to my easy chair
There comes a little maiden,
With sunny golden hair.

She asks me for a story, oft,
And unto her I tell,
The story of the great crusades
And what they did so well.

She listens with wide open eyes,
And cherry lips apart,
With breath abated, stopping quite,
And loudly beating heart.

I tell her of the women's work,
The good they oft had done,
The great discouragements they met,
The many victories won;

And then I tell how wicked men
Had tried to do them harm;
And while I speak, her little heart
Is filled with vague alarm.

And as I start to tell her more
The darling speaks again,
And says in tones of great surprise,
"Why, where were all the men?"

"NEVER START ANYTHING YOU CAN'T STOP."

BY HELEN PEARSON BARNARD.

"Look at Rob; going so fast you can see the soles of his new boots! What's up?"

Rob Kerr paused to answer the boys. "Going to ride on grandsir's engine."

"Couldn't you squeeze us in, too? Say, Rob"—

But Rob thought he heard the car bell, and was showing the soles again. The boys followed.

When they got there, Rob's grandfather, Adolph Kerr, was carefully examining the engine, oil can in hand, while Silas, the fireman, looked out of the little window.

"Hercules is all right, boss; I've looked him over myself," said Silas.

"I know you always do," said Mr. Kerr, "but it's my way to look over the engine myself before starting. We can't be too careful."

"He's right," Silas told the boys. "Ef he hadn't, reg'lar as clock-work, traveled all over the Hercules, he wouldn't be called the best engineer on the road. 'Dolph Kerr's run the longest, too."

Rob was pleased to have the boys hear that.

"Rob, here—he'll be running the Hercules when grandsir's laid up," added Silas.

"I could now, almost," said Rob.

"Oh, hear him!" laughed Silas. "We may as well both lay ourselves away, boss."

Mr. Kerr made no reply, but stepped aboard. How the boys envied Rob as he rang the bell! The conductor shouted, "All aboard!" and away they went along the iron track.

They ate supper while the train waited at a junction. Silas made coffee and boiled eggs; Rob toasted bread on the end of the boiler.

Every chance he could get, Rob was on the Hercules. All the other engineers knew Rob, the grandson of old Adolph Kerr, and never sent him away if they saw him about the engine house. They trusted him because his grandfather did. Rob was very proud of this.

One day, when he was alone on the Hercules, two schoolmates came along.

"Grandfather away, Rob?"

"Yes, and Silas. They've left me in charge."

"Let us get up there, too?"

"Couldn't think of it!" said Rob. "If Silas catches boys round here he'll give them a shaking."

"We won't stay but a minute; we'll run when we see him coming."

"If I let you fellows aboard you'll get into mischief," said Rob.

They promised not to touch anything. At length Rob let them come up where he was. Very soon one said, "My uncle makes engines, so I know a lot about them, too. Wouldn't it be fun to set this going, just a minute?"

"Rob don't dare start up!" said the other.

"I dare, but I won't!"

"What's the harm?" asked the first. "Uncle showed me how to reverse the lever."

Rob said no; but they kept on hinting and coaxing. By-and-by Rob peered out to see if anybody was coming, a strange, guilty look on his face; then there was a familiar sound from the mighty horse—it moved slowly along the siding.

"There, didn't I know how to start it?" cried Rob.

The Hercules went faster, it seemed to be getting ready for a race.

"Now we must stop it!" cried Rob. "Reverse the lever, quick!"

But the boy had forgotten how! He jumped from the engine, telling the other to "Come on." So Rob was alone, and in a sad fix. Pale as death, he tried with all his strength to do as he had seen his grandfather. It was useless! He had let loose a force he could not stop. He, too, jumped, throwing himself the same way the engine was going; rolled over and down the bank into the bushes.

And now there was a great cry from Silas and Mr. Kerr. With terrified faces they chased the Hercules. They were too late to get aboard; the engine had left the siding for the main road; sped along to a bend and disappeared, the ground trembling beneath its powerful tread.

Rob felt that he never could look his grandfather in the face again. He hid till dark. Then he went home. His mother was crying. And his grandfather? It seemed as if he had grown years older. Silas was there, too, talking pitifully of the Hercules as if it were some living reature that had lost its life.

"Why, here's Rob," said Silas, "ye won't have no more fine rides with your grandsir and me! They've put us out of a job. Heard how the Hercules got away today? Wouldn't be ketched no more'n a wild horse o' the desert; he stove up a coal train and pitched head-fust into a pasture!"

Rob was surprised that no one suspected him. "Anybody killed?" he whispered.

"All living," was Silas's queer reply, "except your grandsir. It pretty nigh finished him."

"Of course he'll get another engine, he's so smart," faltered Rob.

Then his grandfather spoke, in a deep, troubled tone. "Nobody would trust the old man again, Rob. They turned him off with hard words. Oh it's a cruel ending for the work of a lifetime!"

Tears filled his eyes; they rushed into Rob's too. He could keep it from his grandfather no longer. He told him all. "If you'll only forgive me," he sobbed, "and trust me as you used to, I'll never touch an engine again, never!"

It added heavily to Mr. Kerr's sorrow to find that Rob had caused their misery, but he put his arm about him and spoke kindly. There's many other things besides engines gets the upper hands, if folks touches them," he said. "I'd willingly suffer if I thought you'd learn this lesson: Never start anything you can't stop. There's men in this town 'll tell you they started drinking and swearing long ago; and it's running away with them now, just as the Hercules did with you. Think of this, Rob, when you remember what happened to your grandsir's last engine!"

That was ten years ago. The old engineer has gone where faithful service is rewarded. Rob has become a young man, but not an engineer; he has never stepped abroad an engine since that painful experience on the Hercules.

But often in the Sunday school class, where he is now teacher, his boys say, "Tell us the story of the wild engine!"

They listen eagerly to the end, when Robert Kerr closes with his grandfather's motto, "Never start anything you can't stop."—Congregationalist.

OUR CHALK TALKER'S LETTER.

Dear Children of the Prevention Army:—I wish I had time to tell you how the boys and girls and even the tiny children make my pictures on the blackboards the next day after my chalk talks. I had amongst others a picture of angels' faces that I had made in my "work shop." One day I thought I would draw them for the children in Griggsville. A teacher in one of the departments gives her pupils a half hour each day to do as they please. When the half hour came around the day after I was there she noticed that nearly every child took out his drawing materials and went to work. She was so amazed at the cause of it that when the time was up she went down the aisle. Pausing at the first desk what should look up at her from the drawing paper but a cluster of angels' faces. She thought it strange and passed on to another and another, and nearly every pupil of the fifty had been making angels' faces. She then asked, "Children, what does all this mean?"

"Why, Nelly Bayley has been here, don't you know?" said they.

When the letter came to me from dear Mattie Yates, that loving, earnest, Christian worker, I was like one in a dream, and I thought, Is it really true? Have my children been making the faces of the angels? Why didn't they make some of my other cuts? Why did one and all make the angels' heads? Ah, I know why. It is because the real, the living angels hover so closely about childhood, beautiful childhood.

Oh, dear young ladies, can you not afford to give some of your time when angels leave their bright abodes to minister unto them? They will not always be children dreaming of the angels, they will ere long drift away from the happy home, the pleasant school room, and be surrounded with temptations. The coming man and woman are the little boy and girl of today. Some little word that you may say, some picture that you may draw may touch some heart and be an amulet of safety for the little feet to the shining gates of paradise. The harvest never was so white, surely "The Master is come and calleth for thee." Will you not hear His voice and come?

Nelly Bayley.

CHARLIE'S HYMN.

Charlie goes to Sunday school and is very fond of the hymns sung there. He likes Happy Land better than any other, and sings it a great deal at his play.

One day he went to his mother and asked her for a cookie.

"What does my little boy say when he wants anything?" asked mamma, for Charlie, like other children forgot to say please.

He thought a minute, then looked up in her face and said, very soberly,

"Why will ye doubting stand,
Why still delay?"

Mamma got him the cookie.—Standard.

QUARTERLY TEMPERANCE LESSON.—No. V.

March 30.

BY REV. SIMEON GILBERT, D. D.

Topic: CONCERNING TEMPTATION.

GOLDEN TEXT: Luke xxii: 46. And Jesus said unto them, Why sleep ye? rise, and pray, lest ye enter into temptation.

Now the serpent was more subtile than any beast of the field which the Lord God had made. And he said unto the woman, Yea, hath God said, Ye shall not eat of every tree of the garden? And the woman said unto the serpent, We may eat of the fruit of the trees of the garden. But of the fruit of the tree which is in the midst of the garden, God hath said, Ye shall not eat of it, neither shall ye touch it, lest ye die. And the serpent said unto the woman, Ye shall not surely die.—Gen. iii: 1-4.

Abram dwelt in the land of Canaan, and Lot dwelt in the cities of the plain, and pitched his tent toward Sodom.—Gen. xiii: 12.

But every man is tempted when he is drawn away of his own lust, and enticed. Then when lust hath conceived, it bringeth forth sin; and sin, when it is finished, bringeth forth death.—James 1: 14-15.

Ye are of your father the devil, and the lusts of your father ye will do; he was a murderer from the beginning, and abode not in the truth, because there is no truth in him. When he speaketh a lie, he speaketh of his own: for he is a liar, and the father of it.—John viii: 44.

OUTLINE: Temptation always a lie; always a fraud; always a mocker; always cruel; always murderous; everywhere, constant exposure; to be avoided; to be resisted; watching against; praying against; in the name and power of the Lord; victory over temptation; glory of the victory.

1. Intemperance and Temptation. Two most awful facts always found together. The great Christian Temperance movement of our time, late in getting started, can make no progress without fighting for every inch of its ground against the terrible power of Temptation. An appallingly large procession of tipplers, year after year, continue to go tripping, sliding, stumbling, reeling, wailing down the steep, slippery incline of the drunkard's delusion, sorrow, wo and doom; as if thousands upon thousands of persons, getting into boats above Niagara should push out from shore, float with the current, and, in full sight of each other, one after another "shoot the cataract" into the abyss. How is it that so many can persist in the fatal way? What makes them do it? What is the truth concerning the terrible Temptation?

You are starting today on life's journey,
Along on the highway of life;
You'll meet with a thousand temptations,
Every place with evil is rife.
This world is a stage of excitement,
There's danger wherever you go;
But if you are tempted in weakness,
Have courage, my friend, to say "No."

2. Temptation always a Lie. Gen. iii: 1-6. It declares that there is some better way than God's way; promises what cannot be fulfilled. The devil, "the father of lies." Said God to our first parents: "Thou shalt surely die," said the tempting Serpent: "Thou shalt not surely die." The tempter gave the lie to God! Those who yield to temptation consent to the same thing.

3. Temptation a Fraud. James i: 12-15. It not only lies, it robs and steals. It not only does not make good its enticing promises, it cheats the soul out of what good it has. Those who yield to it are doomed to disappointment. The sinful illusion incapacitates, pollutes and spoils its victim. The Christian martyr may be scourged and thrust into reeking dungeons or burned at the stake; but what compensation he has! The drunkard, the sensualist in the swift ending of his guilty pleasures, in his deepening self-degradation and moral pollution; what compensation has he? He has staked his all, and lost it.

There's a demon in the glass—
Dash it down!
With a chain of triple brass—
Dash it down!
There is many a bosom's throe,
And a world of bitter woe,
Lying underneath its flow—
Dash it down.

4. Temptation a Mocker. Prov. xx: 1. The devil tempted Judas; Judas tempted the high priests; when the disillusioned wretch began to see his wretchedness, and wanted them to take back the price of his treachery, what cared they for his tortured conscience? With crushing scorn they retort: "What is that to us; see thou to that." The intemperate man said in his heart, "I won't be bound by the laws of purity and of God." Now, how do the chains of appetite and passion and habit mock at the impotence of his broken-down will and lost manhood.

All its mirth is but a snare—
All its promises are air—
And its laugh becomes a grin,
And its pleasures turn to sin,
While it draws its victim in—
Dash it down!

5. Temptation a Murderer. John viii: 44. Which is worst, to kill the body, or to murder the soul? Under the enticements to sin there lurks the malice of murder. How fair and noble, how bright and glorious human life in this world might have been; think what sorrows, shame and woe have cursed it. But see how the intemperate, as if with the mocking cruelty of fiendish spirits, will go on tempting each other to still deeper undoing. The liquor saloon, how horrible its murderous business of temptation!

While it offers to defend,
And it flatters as a friend,
There is ruin in the end—
Dash it down!

6. The Extent of Temptation. Who is there that has escaped it, in one form or another? So certainly as death follows every birth does temptation, in some way test and entice every person born into the world. It is in the air; it is in the sinful heart itself. No fondest mother loves her child too much; but she should remember its exposure to temptation. It is a "hard world" for both boys and girls; always so in case their parents, their friends, or they themselves, are heedless concerning temptations.

Rescue the perishing,
Care for the dying,
Snatch them in pity from sin and the grave;
Weep o'er the erring one,
Lift up the fallen,
Tell them of Jesus the mighty to save.

7. The Strength of Temptation. Mark ix: 17-29. A depraved heart; a tempting devil; a world full of tempters. How fearful, fiendish and deadly the power of temptation that can blast so much beauty; destroy so much good; do so much harm.

Yield not to temptation
For yielding is sin,
Each victory will help you
Some other to win;
Fight manfully onward,
Dark passions subdue,
Look ever to Jesus,
He'll carry you through.

8. The Peril amid Temptation. Prov. xxiii: 20, 31, 32; Matt xxvi: 41. Where saloons abound temptations multiply; nothing is safe. Prov. vi: 27. Can a man take fire in his bosom and his clothes not be burned? No one brings a blacksmith's shop into a powder magazine. Yet thousands with a most temptible appetite, steal away from their homes into saloons with just the safety of summer flies that swarm about the fascinating flame.

Dare to do right! Dare to be true!
You have a work that no other can do;
Do it so bravely, so kindly, so well,
Angels will hasten the story to tell.
Dare to do right! Dare to be true!

9. Is Temptation, then, Irresistible? See I. Cor., x: 13. But this does not mean that one who, ignoring all dangers and defying all restraints and spurning all cautions and heavenly helps, shall wilfully slide off the roof of a house, can say, when half way down to the ground, "No! I won't touch the bottom!"

Down in the human heart,
Crushed by the tempter,
Feelings lie buried that grace can restore;
Touched by a loving heart,
Wakened by kindness,
Chords that were broken will vibrate once more.

10, Avoiding Temptation. — The prayer our Lord taught us, "Lead us not into temptation." See Prov. 1: 10–17. Avoid the places, and the company, that "lead into temptation."

11. How to resist Temptation. James iv: 7-8.—Resist the devil, draw nigh to God. Resist; he will flee. Draw near, for He will draw near. The way to put out darkness, strike a light. Yet the heart cannot remain "empty, swept and garnished." "Christian temperance," the only safe platform for temperance reform.

12. When to Resist. Instantly; constantly. To stop for debate, parley and dalliance with temptation, is to invite defeat and moral disaster.

13. Watching against Temptation. Matt. xxvi: 41: Mark, xiii: 33-37; xiv: 38. Luke, xxii: 40-46; Eph. vi: 18. It is the temptation that comes suddenly, or else subtilely and unawares that is most to be dreaded.

14. Watching and Praying. Heb. ii: 18. "He is able to help them that are tempted." There is no tempted soul that does not need His aid. Most wonderful the victories over temptation, gained through the power of Christ. The conversion and reformation of the drunkard, the miracles of Christian history.—Rev. iii: 10.

15. Victory over Temptation.—Rev. ii: 7, 9-11; 26–38; iii: 5; 11, 12; 20-22. The world loves to celebrate the great victories of history. Thousands of monuments have been reared to perpetuate the memory and the glory of these. As this great uprising, widening Christian Temperance movement goes on in the name and power of Christ the Lord, conquering and to conquer, sweeping through all churches, all Sunday schools, all communities, rescuing the perishing, delivering the tempted, building, in just laws and dominant sentiment, the impregnable barriers of home-protection; and, alike in city and in country, purging the land of the almost infinite defilements, degradations, and woes now caused by intemperance, what victories there are certain to be, over which all good people and the angels of heaven shall join in celebration! Rev. v : 11–14.

Mine ears have caught the footfalls of the coming of the Lord,
He is marshaling His squadrons He has girded on His sword;
The timid and the silent, they are must'ring at His word;
Our God is marching on!

From the closet and the prayer-room tones of hallow'd wrestling swell,
Up from "sample-room" and "cellar" ring the madden'd cries of hell;
Where shall wave the victor's banner, grandest words of promise tell;
His day is marching on!

Sister, up; for He is passing; rise! today He calls for thee;
Yours has been the heavy anguish; you shall share the victory;
Lo, the might of God is in you; you shall triumph gloriously.
His day is marching on!

POINTS FOR THOUGHT AND ACTION.

1. Is the Temperance outlook, at the present moment, encouraging?
2. Looking at the present situation, what are the points of immediate urgency.
3. What more might be done to warn, and to educate the young against temptations?
4. Is there anything more that might be done to lessen and to offset the temptations of the so called working classes?
5. What a courageous and faithful enforcement of the laws, as they are, would have to do in lessening temptations.
6. The duty of all Christians with reference to Citizens' Law and Order Leagues.
7. The true motive in all this Temperance movement.
8. The reasonableness of spiritual courage.
9. The value of spiritual courage.
10. How to protect our homes from the temptation.

THE LEGEND OF THE PIASAU.

Many thousand moons before the arrival of the pale faces, when the great Megalonyx and Mastodon, whose bones are dug up, were still in this land of green prairies, the numerous and powerful nation called the Illinois, inhabited the state which now bears their name, over the greater portion of which their hunting grounds extended. For many years they continued to increase in numbers and prosperity, and were deemed the bravest and most warlike of all the tribes of the great valley. At length, near the most populous districts of their country, near the residence of their greatest chief, there appeared an enormous animal—part beast and part bird—which took up its abode on the rock, and banqueted daily upon numbers of the people, whom it bore off in its immense talons. It was covered with scales of every possible color, and had a huge tail, with a blow of which it could shake the earth. From its head, which was like the head of a fox, with the beak of an eagle, projected immense horns, and its four feet were armed with powerful claws, in each of which it could carry a buffalo. The flapping of its enormous wings was like the roar of thunder, and when it dived into the river it threw the waves far upon the land. To this animal they gave the name of the bird of the Pi-a-sau, or "Bird of the Evil Spirit." (According to some, "the bird which devours men.")

In vain did the medicine men use all their power to drive away this fearful visitor. Day by day the number of their tribe diminished to feed his insatiable appetite. Whole villages were desolated, and consternation spread through all the tribes of the Illinois. At last the young chief of the nation, Wassatogo, or Ouataga, beloved by his people and esteemed their greatest warrior, and whose fame extended even beyond the great lakes, called a council of the priests in a secret cave, where, after fasting many days, they slept, and the Great Spirit came to the young chief in his sleep, and told him the only way to rid his people of their destroyer was to offer himself as a sacrifice. Wassatogo started up, aroused the slumbering priests, and informing them of what had occurred to him, announced his determination to make the required sacrifice.

Wassatogo then dressed himself in his chieftain's garb, put on his war paint as if going to battle, and taking his bow and arrows and tomahawk, he placed himself on a prominent point of rock to await the coming of the monster bird. Meanwhile, as had been directed in his vision, a band of his best braves had been concealed in the interstices of the rock, waiting each with his arrow drawn to the head of the monster when their chief should be attacked, to wreak their last vengeance on their enemy. High and erect the bold Wassatogo stood, chanting his death-song with a calm and placid countenance, when suddenly there came a roar as of awful thunder, and in an instant the Bird of the Piasau, uttering a wild scream that shook the hills, darted down upon the chief. At that moment Wassatogo dealt it a blow on the head with his tomahawk, and every bow sprung at once, sent its arrow quivering up to the feather in its body. The Piasau uttered a wild shriek that resounded far over the opposite shore of the river, and expired. Wassatogo was safe. Not an arrow, not even the talons of the bird had touched him. The Master of Life, in admiration of the generous deed of Wassatogo, had held over him an invisible shield.

The tribe now gave way to the wildest joy, and held a great feast in honor of the event, and to commemorate it, painted the figure of the bird on the side of the rock on whose summit the chieftain stood, and there it has endured for ages, a mark for the arrow or bullet of every red man who has since passed it in ascending or descending the great Father of Waters.

THE DAY OF HIGH LICENSE.

The history of license is full of compromises very like the present high license episode. All through the two and a half centuries since men began to rid (?) the world of the drink traffic by a system of legislative teasing and torture, there have been occasional outbursts of enthusiasm over a new device of legal torment designed and expected to accomplish all that is possible in the way of suppressing the evil.

The first license act on record is that of 1660, but it did not even check the then rapidly flowing stream of intemperance. Hogarth's brush all too truthfully portrays the drink inspired horrors of Gin Lane and Beer Alley, and the government moves to a redress of some of the most grievous wrongs by way of the Gin Act of 1736—an act so far transcending the scope and purpose of excise duty that it remained a dead letter until 1743, when a moderate tax on the gin, and a small fee from the dealer was required. In 1820 still another effort was made by increase of duties, to secure a greater immunity from the ills of liquor sales, an effort which has been repeated frequently during the past sixty years. For nearly a quarter of a century the excise tax on spirituous liquors has been $2.50 per gallon throughout Great Britain while the beer tax is scarcely four cents per gallon. How far this legislation contributed to decrease the manufacture and sale of spirituous liquors, the excise returns for the years immediately following tell the story:

In 1862 the receipts were $91,660,000, and increased steadily year by year till in 1877 they reached the sum of $138,680,000. The increase of receipts from malt liquors was not far behind growing from $29,331,510 in 1862, to $40,201,890 in 1877: In the one case an advance of over 150, and in the other of 75 per cent.

In 1830, Parliament hoping to secure a decrease in the consumption of distilled drinks, opened the flood gates of beer by the notorious Beer Act. Then, as in later times and efforts, good men urged this measure as a sure aid to temperance. But a short experience served to show its futility. We have often referred to Sydney Smith's epigrammatic summing up of the case against the Beer Act:

"Everybody is drunk," he wrote, "and those not singing are sprawling. The sovereign people is in a beastly state."

The church set its seal to the facts, and civil authorities agreed in the verdict, one of them averring that "this unfortunate Act not only increased enormously the consumption of beer, but also generated and stimulated an appetite for stronger liquors and the consumption of them largely increased."

In our own country the history of governmental dealing bears the same mark of failure. The revenue from the manufacture and sale of liquors in our country has mounted up steadily year by year, and for the last few years at the alarming increase of ten or eleven millions per annum; and so great has been the impetus given to manufacture that there are now over sixty million gallons of spirits lying in bond, not wanted in the market, which, nevertheless, by the expiration of the bonded period must be put upon the market glutting it and sacrificing it, unless congress will give further govermental aid and protection to the traffic by extension of the bonding period.

We have made in the last twenty years an increase of nearly five hundred per cent. in the manufacture of distilled, and of over eight hundred per cent. in the manufacture of fermented liquors. No wonder statesmen and philanthropists cry out for some new device by which to hedge about the encroachments of the fearful traffic. Tax laws have been exploited, but the simple change of name effects no cure, nor eases the pain under which the country smarts. It is not the genius of this country to delude itself with this sort of extenuation. Temperance agitation and education has accomplished the awakening of the populace to the evils, the extent and the impending calamities of the system. The revenue is in excess of governmental demands. Politicians warily scent the breeze of popular opinion and trim their projects to meet the new sentiment. To turn the surplus revenue back into the pockets of the people would seem to be a popular measure, and would at the same time fasten the liquor revenue more securely upon the government. But the national conscience has been too much enlightened, and this sally from the port holes of the citadel meets no huzzas from the people. Right at this juncture high license comes forth, from the same stronghold however, and with disarming frankness says, "The abolition of the liquor traffic is a question of time. Do not seek to capture the fortress at one onslaught, rather make your attack by substantial but gradual approaches. If you cannot get what you want, take what you can get."

Beside this plausible pleading the new claimant makes a vigorous drive at some weak and unenlightened consciences in this shape:

"If you withstand and oppose high license which must inevitably close up the lowest liquor dives, how can you reconcile it with your love for God and humanity if by your opposition this possible curtailment of the powers of evil fails to become law, and the appalling tide of sin and shame and sorrow rushes on unchecked."

Good men have been dragooned by these specious pleas and false thrusts at conscience into a support of high license as against low license, not, they claim however, as against prohibition. If such could only see how by these ill-judged concessions they do really retard and by so much oppose prohibition, we are sure their action, whether it be of votes, or incentives to high license legislation, would be bewailed in bitter repentance.

But the great hindrance to the near triumph of the reform, that which makes all this trifling and higgling possible, is the fact that the relation of the liquor traffic to government has never yet been made a moral question in government. If it were this today high license would be scouted with the same vigor and firmness as low license.

Let the moral principle involved in the licensing of saloons be once thoroughly understood; let the powers of the liquor license, derived from the consent of the public, be fully estimated; let its effects on individual and national character be clearly demonstrated, and no force under heaven can be found strong enough to bind its sin-cursed yoke upon the nation's shoulders. Financial considerations, political affiliations, national prejudice, all will go to the wall when once the great heart and brain of the nation apprehends the toleration of the liquor traffic as wrong, wrong only, and wrong continually. When this long delayed consciousness arrives, when the strong will and keen sense are fully aroused to face the temperance question with the sharp, decisive Is it right? Is it wrong? then the day of high license, and all similar compromises of expediency with integrity, is over. God speed that day.

The temperance committee appointed by the synod of West Jersey, is "following on" to educate and agitate along the lines laid down by the synod: Says the chairman of the committee, Rev. J. DeHart Bruen, to his constituency:

I would respectfully urge upon the reverend clergy of the Presbytery of West Jersey, the duty of frequently presenting this great subject bothfrom the pulpit and in the Sabbath school, and of securing the circulation of a carefully selected temperance literature, I would urge further that you endeavor to arouse the sentiment of the communities in which you live by means of public meetings and lectures. In view of the action of the synod denouncing liquor selling as a crime, and approving its legal prohibition, and in view of the facts of the great struggle, I would earnestly recommend that you instruct the voters who listen to your teaching, in regard to their duty in this work, especially in attending the political meetings of their several parties, and opposing by every honest means the election of men in sympathy with the liquor trade to offices in the city, county or state, or as delegates to nominating conventions, and that they seek to nominate and elect men who will fearlessly and earnestly work for the abolition of this liquor business, as inimical to the interests and rights of both church and state, a fruitful source of misery, crime and death, temporal and eternal, and as involving a cruel and tyrannical trespass upon the rights and personal liberty of a vast number of citizens (often helpless women and children) nearly related to its victims.

A Christian lawyer is one of God's noblemen Such an one was Cyrus L. Blanchard, the youngest son of President Jonathan Blanchard, whose name is enshrined in many loyal hearts, the pupils of a long and busy educational life.

The tenses of the verb To Be suffer strange and infelicitous usage as the pen essays to note that incident in life which men call death. We say Cyrus L. Blanchard was—because on a certain day and hour the manly figure, the luminous face, the cheery voice passed from our sight, but our eyes grown used to seeing that which is invisible, peer out a little way into the land that is not very far off, and watch the triumphal progress of his freed spirit through the ministries of heaven.

A useful life here must be a useful life there—a valiant soldier of the Lord here surely will not fail in courage, zeal or faithful service by promotion to the ranks on high. The beauty and strength of Mr. Blanchard's character strongly impressed all who knew him, but none more thoroughly appreciated him than the Woman's Christian Temperance Union of Chicago in whose service he spent many laborious days. The song of his happy, unselfish life was,

Use me, God, in Thy great harvest field,
Which stretcheth far and wide like a white sea;
The gatherers are so few, I fear the precious yield
Will suffer loss. O, find a place for me.

A place where best the strength I have will tell—
It may be one the other toilers shun;
Be it a wide or narrow place, 'tis well,
So that the work it holds be only done.

"Profit and Loss," a late addition to the Chellis Library, published by the National Temperance Society, is a bright story by Mrs. Chellis, whose pen has much enriched the Sunday school libraries of the country. The temperance story is an old, old story, new only in its applications, but scarcely varying in incident and plan. The wonder is, however, that people read it so calmly and then go on hugging license delusions to their souls.

For solid appreciation of true worth, and perception of the "fitness of things" commend us to the governor of Maine who has appointed as commissioners to the World's Industrial and Cotton Centeninal Exposition, two of the general officers of the Maine W. A new volume of Moody's sermons is among our accumulated store. It is entitled "The Way to God," and How to Find it, published by F. H. Revell, Chicago. These are sermons given both in Great Britain and our own country, and have been signally owned by the Master as pointing, like John of old, to the Savior of the world.

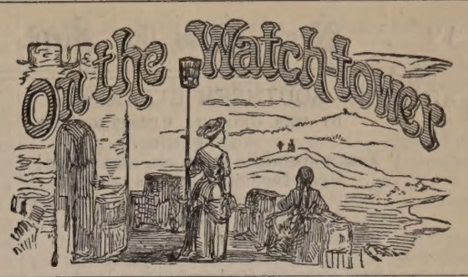
Maine amends Iowa's happy thought so as to read, "A school house on every hill-top and in every valley, and no saloon anywhere!" And Maine "directs."



Miss Rose Phillips, Missouri's live secretary, writes me:

Mrs. Clara Hoffman made a most earnest and eloquent plea for our cause today before the St. Louis M. E. conference assembled here. She gave some most unanswerable, and therefore convincing testimony of the evil effects of the tobacco habit, and urged upon the ministers the duty of beginning a reformation in the church, even if their efforts did cut close to prominent lay members, Sunday school superintendents and church officials. These are those who do most harm by indulging in such an evil habit. The boys try to imitate the men they most revere. She said the tobacco habit is ruining the present generation of boys. Her address was well received.

How many hopes, prayers and tears were represented in that beautiful basket of flowers presented to Professor Foster, that faithful Knight of Prohibition, in the Dominion parliament the other day! I don't know as I regret that the women are personally unrepresented there, since they have the free speech of flowers, and a voice so resonant from Nova Scotia to Vancouver's Island.

* * * * *

It looks too as if the woman's soprano was about to pipe in with more than metonymic power in Canada. Ontario, I see, has decided in favor of woman suffrage with regard to municipal elections. A bill to grant women the right to vote at municipal elections has passed its second reading by a large majority, the government and opposition leaders being both divided in opinion on the subject. As the passage of the second reading involves the acceptance of the principle of the measure, there can be little doubt that the bill will become law and without mutilation in view of the large majority—sixteen in a house of sixty-eight—in its favor.

Dr. Dorchester in one of his admirable reviews of the temperance reform, says that in 1876, out of 8034 saloon keepers in Philadelphia, it was found that 7,155 were foreigners, 2,179 Germans, and 3,041 Irish, only 205 were Americans.

A wise woman in Minnesota, the wife of the Indian agent on a reservation in that state, wishing to produce some lasting temperance impressions on the minds of the red men within her reach, sends ten dollars to The Union Signal, copies of the paper to be sent in return to the Indians who can read. Alcohol she says, is their worst enemy. Total abstinence will be their friend.

I happen to know of a beautiful home in an inland town, visited by recent financial misfortune which would receive a few children of good families, whose parents by reason of illness or misfortune are unable to give them home care and training. The family is one of unimpeachable Christian character, bred in ways of culture and refinement, and would afford rare opportunities in the matter of education, careful training and wholesome Christian influence. I shall take pleasure to answer inquiries that may arise in regard to the matter.

O breaking heart, full of sorrow for some body's sin, listen to this bit of comfort from Mrs Whitney's pen:

I heard an old farmer talk, one day,
Telling his listeners how
In the wide, new country far away,
The rainfall follows the plow.

"As fast as they break it up, you see,
And turn the heart to the sun,
As they open the furrows deep and free,
And the tillage is begun,

"The earth grows mellow; and more and more
It holds and sends to the sky
A moisture it never had before
When its face was hard and dry.

"And so, wherever the plowshares run,
The clouds run overhead;
And the soil that works, and lets in the sun,
With water is always fed."

I wonder if that old farmer knew
The half of that simple word,
Or guessed the message that, heavenly-true,
Within it was hidden and heard?

It fell on my ear by chance that day:
But the gladness lingers now,
To think it is always God's dear way
That the rainfall follows the plow.

SOUTHERN GLEANINGS.

BY MRS. GEORGIA HULSE MCLEOD.

SEEDLINGS.

"Your pure white snow, oh, north land!
Upon the brown earth's breast,
Keeps warm the seed not long since sown,
As birdlings in their nest—
The golden grain of by and by,
Will glorious harvest yield—
Seed sown for God and native land,
In every whitening field;
And some were dropped in southern soil,
Tended with loving care,
The temperance victors' Harvest Home
We'll join in, everywhere!"

Maryland.—The Maryland house of delegates (Feb. 29) concurred in the senate message to appoint a temperance committee. The speaker appointed a committee of four. Bills were introduced in the senate to impose additional license on the sale of spirituous and fermented liquors. Persistent efforts of the Maryland Temperance Alliance and the W. C. T. U. are beginning to tell.

West Virginia.—Miss Jennie Smith and Miss Sherman, are in attendance at the annual meeting of the Martinsburg W. C. T. U.

A new and flourishing union was organized last week by Mrs. Love, at Terra Alta, with Mrs. Dr. Frey as president. Miss Sherman reports a large meeting on the occasion, with forty-five signing the pledge preparatory to becoming members.

Alabama.—"Here we rest" the state's significant name, will soon need to be changed by the earnest workers in the ranks of the W. C. T. U.

Their appreciation of our national organizer, Miss Henrietta G. Moore, of Ohio, and their courteous hospitality and co-operation in her work, is pleasant to hear of. The state president writes thus: "Miss Moore, who will be in Mobile March 2, has accomplished a vast amount of good in the south and we feel that no truer, purer, more heroic woman than Henrietta G. Moore, has ever enlisted in the holy war for 'God and home and native land.' May we raise up a nation of such women."

Another Alabamian writes: "Miss Moore and Mrs. Chapin are the only ladies who have ever addressed a public audience in our town. Mrs. Chapin is beloved by all, and as a speaker attracts and magnetizes. The two are so entirely different we attempt no comparisons. Miss Moore is gentle and winning in manner, her style logical, eloquent and persuasive."

Florida.—A convention letter with full account of the same will go direct to our national organ. The outlook is encouraging. A minister of the M. E. church south, writes: "Our local option law is good, but I am sorry to say it is not faithfully enforced in Jacksonville, the opinion of the county commissioners to the contrary notwithstanding. The advocates of temperance in the city are waging uncompromising war against the vile traffic, but the liquor men are organized and defiant. They engage in their nefarious calling Sunday as well as every other day. I use the word 'calling' because a man who sells liquor is called of the devil."

Texas.—Mrs. Jennie Bland Beauchamp, the president of the state W. C. T. U., to quote a Dallas journal, "Is an intelligent, enthusiastic, wide awake worker. Under her direction the W. C. T. U. is laboring diligently. Success to their efforts!"

Mrs. Lizzie Johnson, of Paris, is engaged in prison work and many a sad heart is encouraged by her self-sacrificing efforts to lift them up to the light of the cross, and in some cases won to be new men in Christ Jesus.

At Whitesboro the Band of Hope, Mrs. Hearn superintendent, is exercising a wide influence. The girls are aiding and lending attractions by their sweet gifts of song—among them Misses Quinlan, Craven and March. And yet, as in other states, the banner of the Lone Star droops sadly over dark scenes. A few days since, Judge Davis left the hotel at Whitesboro, wandered two miles out on the prairie and there, amid the raging elements, died a miserable death, his dead body found next morning. This was the sad end of another victim to the drink habit—once a lawyer of high promise and a member of the state legislature. How long shall these things be?

MICHIGAN.

The sixth district is carrying out the will of the national as far as possible. Some counties are more thoroughly organized than others, this is especially true of Livingston county. They have just held their county convention at Pinckney, a little village on the new air line, with a purer air than many of us are permitted to breathe, for local option is carried out there.

The program was very full, and whether finished papers or impromptu talk, all were alike good. The last evening was given up to the discussion of license versus prohibition. The night was inclement but three old veterans rode ten and seventeen miles to help us, and the thoughts of one who had waited for the dawn of this "Easter morning" forty years, stimulated our courage, encouraged our patience.

Milford.—"More alive than dead" may be ascribed to the temperance sentiments in Milford, as was manifested by the ladies on a recent Thursday afternoon, who met by appointment Mrs. Johnston, president of the sixth congressional district of the W. C. T. U. She is thoroughly alive to the great work and gave us out of her storehouse such thoughts as would inspire us to renewed efforts and zeal in this great field of labor, and the key note to all her talk was faith in God and in prayer, believing that in His own time His cause must triumph, not forgetting that this must be followed by works, which is God's own appointed way.

Her enthusiastic remarks were followed by others no less earnest in their love for souls, till all caught the inspiration and seemed loth to leave the subject which lies so near the heart of every earnest reasonable Christian man and woman. W. C. T. U.

Grand Rapids.—The temperance organizations of this city, viz: Good Templars, Royal Templars and W. C. T. Unions, have united for aggressive work. Sunday afternoon temperance meetings are held, with good speakers, music and fair sized audiences. It is hoped that this movement will awaken a renewed interest in the cause, and bring into active co-operation many who are now in sympathy with us but are not openly avowed temperance people.

The first meeting was held Feb. 17, the speaker being Mrs. Helen M. Gougar, of Lafayette, Ind. Her subject was "High License," and by her eloquence and logical argument she proved this "craze" to be a "snare and a deceit." Mrs. Gougar made many friend in Grand Rapids, and it is hoped she will visit us again in the near future. Feb. 24, Hon. A. B. Cheny, of Sparta, a well known advocate of temperance and prohibition, gave the address, and March 2, Mr. James Chalmers, state organizer for the I. O. G. T., entertained and instructed the audience, which was largely composed of young men. Mr. Chalmers is but twenty-one years of age, is well posted, a natural orator, and gives promise of a wide and useful career as a public speaker.

The W. C. T. U., in connection with the Union Benevolent Association, have conducted through the severe cold weather, a soup room where poor persons—men out of employment, boot blacks, newsboys, and poor women with children—have been provided with food.

We are working (strange as it may seem that there is any necessity for it) to banish from the Lord's table fermented wine. Several churches in this city have thus far withstood all the enlightenment and Christian remonstrance, still clinging to the old custom.

One of our resident physicians has written a very able article on the subject. We have had it printed in the Saturday Evening Post and assisted in its circulation.

We are trying to work as best we can, leaving the result with God. Mrs. J. M. Wheeler.

St. Joseph.—From across the sand dunes and frozen grandeur of old Lake Michigan I send you greeting. Be it known unto you that our little city "which is set upon a hill and cannot be hid," is having a temperance revival. Hughes and Ward have been with us and 800 persons have signed the pledge during their stay, while the work is still carried forward by the W. C. T. U. aided by many of our business men. Blue ribbons (the Hughes and Ward color) are thick upon our streets, and as they multiply of course the number of cardinal noses will diminish. One good sign is that temperance men who never signed a pledge before have put down their names and pinned on the blue ribbon. A society or club has been formed and a reading room nicely furnished. The officers of the society are all men deeply interested in the manufacturing and business interests of St. Joseph, men of large means and good strong determination, so we have good ground for expecting to push the whisky ring to the wall. We are hoping to elect temperance candidates this year, so ridding our city of saloons. Of course we cannot foretell the result of the election, as the whisky men have their paid workers who vote early and often. But we have strong faith that this year we shall see "the beginning of the end."

CANADA.

Quebec.—We have just held here our second annual meeting, from which you will gather that we are the second union in the province. Mrs. Youmans was with us at our last anniversary, and from her visit dates the new impetus given us. Her inspiriting words and her fearless denunciations roused many till then halting between two opinions, and those who were fortunate enough to know her personally will never forget what a kind, motherly, unassuming soul she was in private life, in such strong contrast to the energy and fire with which she charged the "gates of hell" on the platform.

In October Miss Willard was with us, and she took all hearts, and won praise from even her natural opponents. Here in Quebec where we are generations behind you Yankees—for every state in the Union is Yankee to us—where we are, though the conquering race, wofully in the minority, where our laws, our language and our religion form a barrier which circumscribes every effort of ours (for outside of our own creed and race we must not venture scarcely to do good, for fear of rousing the priesthood), we are thoroughly conservative, and a woman on a platform is a rara avis indeed. Consequently to hear a young and handsome woman (one too who did not rant nor cant) many came from mere curiosity, and among all there has never been heard a word save in the highest eulogy. One fault, however, has been found by all, her stay was all too short, and a rainy Sunday afternoon and evening by no means satisfied us, though packed houses and good collections at both meetings greeted her.

Last in order of the trio we have been privileged to hear and entertain during the year comes Mrs. McLaughlin, who was with us three days, and who spoke in public four times, besides holding a drawing-room. Of the enthusiasm created by her it will be unnecessary to attempt a description for those who have seen and heard her, scarcely even to say that one of our largest churches had to be secured for her after the first evening. Thanks to her, thanks to them all, our union is growing and flourishing, and steady efforts are being made by women who, but for the example of these noble women, would never have dared to testify even had they been convinced. You over the border who have extended through these your sisters, to us a helping hand, cannot guess how great has been the good done; for it has shown even us women who are timid, that women like ourselves may really work in these days like our masters, and that we need not fear in a cause upheld by such women as Mrs. Youmans, Miss Willard, Mrs. McLaughlin and hundreds like them to dare public opinion if need be. The sight of a womanly woman in the highest sense of the term, not ranting, wearing bloomer costume nor endowed with any of the other monstrosities popularly attributed here to a woman who ventures over the threshold of her own home, has done us all good in every way. The temperance cause and every one who confesses its principles has good right to be proud of such advocates as those that we have welcomed among us, and parted with so unwillingly as to make us hope to see them again ere long.

The writer may trouble The Union Signal again from time to time. (The editor trusts that she will.)

FLORIDA.

CONVENTION NOTES.

The closing services of the state convention were most kindly noticed by the Jacksonville press. Mrs. Sallie F. Chapin presided, Mrs. Davis, of Fitchburg, Mass., conducting the devotional exercises. The committee on juvenile work reported 1,500 members enrolled.

The report of Mrs. Gwynn, the state president, was able. It held that the law makers, not the rum sellers, were responsible for all the ruin and desolation caused by its sale. Local option was eulogized and the W. C. T. U. congratulated on the influence and effect of its work.

Mrs. Hannah Whitall Smith held a consecration meeting at noon, and gave a Bible reading in the evening. She had also appointments in three different churches for the Sabbath. She is welcomed by crowded houses.

The children of the Bands of Hope of Jacksonville gathered at the grammar school (good omen!) and marched to the hall with banners flying, interrupting the afternoon exercises of the convention. Mrs. Chapin introduced them as "Our future voters, presidents, congressmen, governors, and—their wives." Master Willie Archibald responded eloquently to Mrs. Chapin's question, "Boys does license pay?" with arguments to prove that it does not pay.

Mrs. H. W. Smith has agreed to remain a few days, the great delight of the citizens. G. H. McL.

NEW JERSEY.

GLEANINGS BY R. P. PENFIELD.

Jersey City.—A series of meetings continuing one week have been held here by Mrs. Downs, state president, and Mrs. J. T. Ellis, state secretary. Much interest was manifested in all the services, and a union of thirty-five members was formed. A children's meeting was held conducted by Mrs. Baldwin, state superintendent of juvenile work, who gave a fine blackboard lesson to the great delight of children and friends present. The clergymen of the city were exceedingly kind and helpful. Of all the cities of our state which we have visited, we find none so completely under the dominion of the rum traffic; the ignorance, the arrogance and aggressiveness of which is without a parallel. No reading room opens its doors, inviting homeless youth within its hospitable portals, no temperance restaurant, most grocers selling intoxicants, no place in that great city where a traveler can get a cooling drink of water, but saloons on every side, and on every corner, and beer, whisky and wine flowing everywhere. To this field of activity in good works this new organization is introduced, and we pray God to help them to be valiant in the fight. Mrs. Downs and Mrs. Ellis go next to Paterson for two meetings. Mrs. Foster's appointments in our state commence March 11 at Lambertville, March 12, Flemington, March 13, Washington, March 14, Jersey City, and on the 16th Camden, which is the Sabbath of the New Jersey conference.

Moorestown.—A large number of friends recently met to hear Dr. Childs on the use of alcohol and its effects on the stomach, blood, liver, heart and brain. He stated that one-half of the insane in the asylums were made so by alcoholic drinks, and urged education on this subject in the family, school and church. He deemed prohibition the best remedy for the evil. Dr. Haines, Dr. Jenny and R. Bingham sustained the speaker and advocated total abstinence prescriptions in the treatment of diseases.

CAMDEN.—The National secretary of railroad work, Miss Jennie Smith, addressed crowded houses Sunday afternoon and evening. Miss Smith, although feeble from recent illness, is doing a mighty work in her journeyings. Our state gives her a right glad welcome. In her meetings along the railroads some of the wives and children of the employes through her instrumentality are among the saved.

DORCHESTER.—This quiet village is on the Maurice river and contains one M. E. church, two extensive ship yards, and I blush to say, one licensed saloon. For seventy years there have been found twelve freeholders each year to certify that this thing was necessary and would conduce to the public good. But at last, thank God, there is to be a mighty effort made this spring to do away with this evil, and we expect success. Money is already subscribed for this purpose.

OCEAN CITY.—We are a temperance people here and stand united on this all important subject.

NEW YORK.

Resolutions passed by the Westchester county convention assembled in Yonkers N. Y. February 26 and 27. Sixty-two delegates present.

Resolved, That we will continue to urge upon the prayerful consideration of pastors of churches the importance of banishing alcoholic wine from the table of our Lord, believing there is no authority from the Bible for its use.

Resolved, That we believe it to be the duty of the church to organize temperance societies in the Sunday schools, and to require at stated times Bible instruction upon temperance.

Resolved, That we rejoice in the action taken by the senate of our legislature in Albany in passing the bill requiring instruction in the public schools of New York in physiology and hygiene relating to intoxicating beverages, stimulants and narcotics upon the human system.

Resolved, That we are in harmony with the avowed principles of our national and state organizations in the preventive measures embraced in the departments of heredity and hygiene, believing that it is to the highest interests of mothers to study those subjects.

Resolved, That we are in accord with our national authorities in the different branches of work included in educational, evangelistic, social and legal departments, that we will employ such agencies, so far as we are able, believing that if we sow beside all waters, in faith and love, in due season there will be an abundant harvest.

Resolved, That we endorse the action of our National W. C. T. U. convention at its recent session in Detroit, to memorialize the political conventions on an amendment to the national constitution prohibiting the liquor traffic, with a duplicate of the same to the congress of the United States.

ROCHESTER.—Permit me the use of a little space in THE UNION SIGNAL, to refer to the work of Mrs. E. Obenauer of East Saginaw, Mich. Not that Mrs. Obenauer requires an introduction to the N. W. C. T. U., but I write in order to aid and encourage any of our sisterhood who may be considering the matter of evangelical work among the Germans.

The engagement of our union with Mrs. Obenauer was for service chiefly among the German population, which in Rochester is estimated at 30,000, with the hope that a temperance organization might be effected. The Baptist, Methodist and Evangelical Association German churches were opened and a cordial welcome extended. A written testimonial from one of the most prominent of these gentlemen, endorsed by the pastor and handed to me, expresses much personal regard and high appreciation of her ministry.

To induce the Germans to receive the gospel of temperance as we hold it, will require time, but we feel that a very important opening has been been made here and hope to recall Mrs. Obenauer soon to garner the fruits of the efforts recently made.

The public services in various churches, Bible readings and private counsels as well, have been greatly blessed spiritually, and have endeared this cultured woman to many hearts, so that we judge her as one of the class to which the apostle refers, as rightly dividing the word of truth.

Having been detained by the demand for her assistance by unions and churches in Rochester and vicinity, since the second week in January, Mrs. Obenauer is at present writing in Buffalo. M. A. HARRINGTON.

ALLEGANY COUNTY CONVENTION.

The W. C. T. U. of Allegany county held its tenth convention in the Presbyterian church, at Almond, Feb. 6. Mrs. M. E. Steele, of Almond, gave an inspiring and instructive address of welcome, and was responded to in a pleasing manner by Mrs. Marion Davis, of Friendship. Miss Emma Ross, of Wellsville, gave a talk to the children, a large number of whom were present, the public school having adjourned for the purpose. Miss Ross chose for her subject "Character Building," and showed the necessity of being strictly temperance boys and girls, illustrating the effect of alcohol upon the system by plates showing different stages of the diseased stomach. At the evening session Mrs. Niles, of Hornellsville, opened the workers' conference by saying it was and always would remain a fact, that success was the result of prayer and its secret holding onto God. God works when we pray. She compared our connection with God to the coupling link which connects the mighty engine with the cars. Urged the necessity of being courageous to face difficulties. Rev. Mr. Steel being called, said: The object for which the Christian women are working will just as surely be attained as the Lord reigns. He spoke of the advancement, during his memory, of the temperance movement, referred to the states, south and west where prohibition was partial or complete, closing with the evident fact that there was a God and that He was for temperance. Mrs. Bradley gave an interesting account of the work of the union in Richburg, and what seventeen members had accomplished, proving that "through God we shall do valiantly." Mrs. Coats, of Wellsville, was next called, and well brought out the comparison between the anti-slavery and prohibition sentiments. Mrs. M. A. Green related a circumstance which occurred on her way to the convention. An old gentleman, who said he lived in Ohio, ludicrously bemoaned the "hard times" the prohibitionists were having in his state. She then showed the need of being earnest and faithful, saying: "When we buckle on the armor we must not expect an easy time, but work, persistent work, doing whatever needs to be done, remembering God does not reward according to results, but according to our motives."

The president introduced Mrs. Scott, of Friendship, who, in the absence of Mrs. Stoddard, gave the lecture, which was equal to any ever delivered before our convention.

Thursday morning at 9 o'clock several met for a prayer meeting, led by Mrs. Gray, of Almond. At 10 o'clock the convention was called. Mrs. L. H. Kenyon presented a paper on beer, which we wish might be published in proper form, for distribution throughout the county. The following questions from the box were answered: "Can a man be a conscientious Christian who votes to support the liquor traffic?" Answer, "A conscientous Christian must be honest." "Which is the greatest offender, the man who drinks or the man who sells the drink?" "The man who drinks sins against himself and his God; the man who sells sins many times, against many." "Will not God hold every protessed temperance worker responsible, if in any measure party, principles are allowed to stand in the way of prohibition?" "God will hold every man responsible for his vote."

The afternoon session, after a prayer meeting, led by Mrs. Larkin, from 1:30 until 2 o'clock, was called to order by the president. Miss Grace Busby held the interest of the large audience by reading the thrilling piece entitled, "Four Scenes" which was followed by a paper, "Self-Control, the Self-Imposed Limitation of Liberty," by Mrs. E. P. Larkin, of Alfred Centre. Discussion, "How can we secure a W. C. T. U. in every Town in the County?" was opened by written suggestions from Miss M. E. Farr, of Angelica. Mrs. Steel said it was quite as important to know how to keep a union running after it was organized. Mrs. Alford said organization lay very heavy upon her heart and strongly urged missionary work to this end. She strongly urged young women's work, saying they had an influence where older ones could do nothing. One encouraging feature of this convention was that, notwithstanding, the weather was very unfavorable and traveling bad, the attendance was good at every session. It was remarked that never before has so large a number of young people been present.

"If there be first a willing mind, it is accepted according to that a (woman) hath and not according to that (she) hath not."

L. A. HULL, Secretary pro tem.

OREGON.

ALBANY.—I very much enjoy reading THE UNION SIGNAL and it seems to me the last number, Feb. 14, is overflowing with good things. There is something in it for every class, and I do not believe anyone can carefully read it without becoming interested in the great reformation advancing so grandly throughout our land.

Our W. C. T. U. was organized in April, 1881, by Mrs. Rebecca Clawson, with sixteen members; it now has a membership of eighty ladies and twelve gentleman. Our work is steadily growing in interest and favor with the people generally and we are thankful to believe we have the confidence of the community.

Our regular meetings are held each alternate Tuesday. Twenty minutes are given each week to devotional exercises and once a month we use the excellent readings prepared by Mrs. H. W. Smith. We have purchased the course of readings on "Total Abstinence" recommended by Miss Willard, and are having selections read in our meetings. A course of seven lectures was given during the winter which were appreciated by the people and aided the union financially. We fill two columns each week in our local papers with items of interest and information from our local work, and clippings from THE UNION SIGNAL and other papers. Have a standing committee on temperance literature, which are doing good service. Several thousand pages of literature have been placed on hooks and distributed at public meetings.

Our committee on work for THE UNION SIGNAL have sent a goodly number of names, and we hope to do much more the coming year. Have taken up evangelistic, Sunday school, public school, and young women's work, and have superintendents appointed for each. The organization of the state union last June, infused new life into our local organizations. Our juvenile work has taken the form of a temperance school. The catechism on alcohol is taught, object lessons frequently given which the children seem to enjoy, with occasional recitations and dialogues.

We have recently rented a room and fitted it up nicely for our meetings, and hope in the near future to open a reading room. Have a good beginning for a library March 4 we have an "opening" for our room—some dedication services followed by a sociable.

Though we have labored under many discouragements yet we rejoice that now our condition is so flattering and prospects so bright. The Lord has indeed blessed us. Praise be to His name.

MRS. M. J. TOWNSEND, Pres.

NEBRASKA.

AURORA—Mrs. Mary T. Folsom, state secretary of the W. C. T. U., lectured here March 1 and 2. Saturday afternoon she spoke to the local union of our responsibility and opportunity in introducing "Scientific instruction" into our public schools. Women in Nebraska have the right to vote on matters pertaining to education. She also told us of the national meeting at Detroit in such an interesting manner that we are all better acquainted with the grand sisterhood to which we belong.

In the evening Mrs. Folsom spoke upon the work of the W. C. T. U. with its thirty-eight departments. The variety and extent of work being accomplished by this organization was a revelation to many in the audience. Sabbath afternoon she addressed the Band of Hope which now numbers over one hundred members.

The children of Aurora as well as the older people will be glad to see Mrs. Folsom here again. Sabbath evening she set forth the need of prohibition and the failure of every other method for suppressing the liquor traffic. The people were pleased with her as a lady and as a public speaker. We hope her words will not be forgotten, but that when our town election occurs in April the voters will roll up a good majority for prohibition. The Red Ribbon Club has opened a reading room. The W. C. T. U. has a column in each of the local papers. We are planning for socials every two weeks, and hope, in this way to interest the young ladies and gentlemen.

March 3 the Band of Hope gave an entertainment consisting of temperance recitations, dialogues and music. The proceeds go toward furnishing books and papers for the Band. MRS. A. L. SEWARD.

Cor. Sec. W. C. T. U. of Aurora.

VIRGINIA

RICHMOND.—You do not often have advices from our state, but we are nevertheless working on smoothly and with some degree of success. A large number of petitions praying for a local option law have been presented to our legislature which is now in session, but they have not yet been acted on, and as the legislature have nearly reached the constitutional limit of the session fears are entertained that no general law will be passed.

In this city we are steadily at work. Our unions meet regularly once a week and there is always something of interest to add life to the meeting. The Y. W. C. T. U. are much interested in a course of reading upon "Alcohol," and a very interesting book called "Mabel." They have two Bands of Hope under their charge, and the children are deeply interested in the work.

We had a delightful entertainment recently from them assisted by some of the boys from the Male Orphan Asylum. The exercises consisted of recitations, songs, dialogues, etc. The boys were presented with medals given for attendance and proficiency in lessons.

In our work among the children we use Cook's Lessons, Band of Hope Library and the Temperance Banner. All seem eager for books and papers. We intend to push the work with greater earnestness and zeal as soon as the weather is more favorable and hope to be able in another year to report much larger results than at our last state convention. AITCH.

ILLINOIS.

EUREKA.—Mrs. J. F. Willing lectured here on temperance to a full house, Feb. 28, and at the close of the lecture at the call of the president, Mrs. E. P. Hall, eighty persons came forward and took the union ironclad pledge, "swearing in" for the war against the rum power.

Mrs. Willing held an "after meeting" with the union pledging them to begin with new zeal two lines of special work;—the training of the children, and the providing of themselves with good temperance reading.

A committee was appointed to correspond with the people at headquarters and mature a plan by which the young ladies shall be set at work drilling the children. We have infinite faith in "our girls,' and we believe they can get every child in the town into their Band of Hope.

Another committee, Mrs. Hall and the indefatigable Miss Dickinson, will perfect a plan for procuring and caring for a good temperance circulating library. Mrs. Willing offers to donate her book, "The Only Way Out," as the sixth volume in said library.

ROCK ISLAND.—Sunday evening, February 22, there was the largest gathering of people in Rock Island for temperance and law and order ever seen here. People came from the country all around us to attend this great people's meeting and hear Father Hagan of Chicago, who spoke under the auspices of our W. C. T. U.

We opened with reading the Scripture and prayer. Father Mackin introduced Father Hagan in a very delightful talk, and Father Hagan gave us a solid temperance talk from beginning to end. He was fearless and forceful, and I have no doubt he did great good among the people he would most influence, and every one pronounced the evening a success. I wish I could give you an idea of the singing, forty of the finest gentlemen embracing the best musical talent in Rock Island with a few voices from Milan and Moline gave us the grandest kind of gospel temperance songs.

We took a collection, having announced it previously for the benefit of the union. The next day my husband came home with an envelope which held a bank check (to be paid "To the little band of temperance solgers, E. Spencer, captin") for twenty dollars, signed by a dear old gentleman whose son has been a victim of intemperance for years, has tried to reform two or three times but never for very long. This donation helped us out on our expenses for the evening and left money in the treasury for the next meeting.

The proprietor of the opera house, Mr. Ben Harper, gave us the use of it and the gas was free. The editor of the Rock Islander printed the programs without charge and we felt that the people here are getting more interested in us and the cause we work for.

Mr. Paxton, of the Citizen's League of Chicago came down with Father Hagan, and on the following Tuesday night addressed a meeting of ladies and gentlemen, when initiatory steps were taken for the organization of a League here. We hope it will be a support to us and accomplish much in the special line of work undertaken.

Lura C. Spencer.

EIGHTH DISTRICT CONVENTION.

Promptness is one of the many admirable characteristics of our worthy district president, Mrs. L. A. Hagans, consequently the first session of our convention opened precisely at the time announced, 10 a. m. The devotional hour was in charge of Mrs. T. M. Gunn.

An address by Mrs. Hagans followed, after which committees on courtesies, enrollment, plan of work and finance were reported, and reports from unions were heard. These reports showed a steady growth in interest and members throughout the district.

The devotional service of the afternoon session was led by Mrs. M. S. Stratton, of Wheaton. The first topic under discussion was "Kindergarten work," which was admirably presented by Mrs. Hagans. Miss Hood followed with a forceful talk upon state work and finance.

Mrs T. B. Carse, of Chicago, next addressed the convention on the need of a building for the W. C. T. U. workers at Chicago, and said one would be built. It is to cost $350,000 and twenty-five year bonds are to be issued, bearing 3 per cent. interest, which bonds can easily be paid during the time they have to run. Mrs. Carse gave a graphic description of the building as it was to be, and said she had faith to believe that a year or two would see the buildlng erected.

Mrs. Hagans introduced Miss Gordon, who spoke to the young ladies present, presenting in a very clear and pleasant way the various methods young ladies might adopt in forming unions and personally aiding the cause of temperance. She lamented the fact that young ladies generally are not actively interested in temperance work —not because they are opposed to it, but from ignorance as to the methods of working. She showed the terrible need of having all possible forces engaged in the work. We need to have the young ladies and young men waked up. Indifference was worse than opposition. Don't be satisfied with your missionary and prayer meeting labors, but lend aid in eradicating this evil. She showed how they had organized in her village in Connecticut, and how after organization, they discovered to their horror and dismay that nearly all their gentlemen friends drank more or less, but by systematic, personal work, most of them were persuaded to abstain. Her native village had come out squarely for no license, and a vote of thanks and an ovation were tendered the young ladies' temperance union by the citizens of the place, as being the potent factor in bringing about this result.

After reading the pledge, which includes cider, and a few stirring remarks on abstinence from even this light beverage, the meeting adjourned to meet in the evening.

A crowded house greeted Miss Frances E. Willard in the evening. Her address was intensely interesting, and it would be impossible to give our readers even a fair idea of her discourse in the small amount of space we can devote to it. She was introduced to the audience by Mrs. T. B. Carse, of Chicago, after preliminary exercises by the choir, Scripture reading by Mrs. H. N. Marsh, and prayer by Rev. F. A. Hardin. Mrs. Carse and Miss Hood made short addresses, and the convention adjourned until 9:30 a. m.

The second day's session opened with devotional exercises led by Mrs. Narramore, of Downer's Grove. The greater part of the morning was taken up with the discussion of finance, resulting in the adoption of a resolution to raise $600 for state and district work, and the "Question box" in charge of Mrs. Lumry, of Wheaton.

A Bible reading by Mrs. Judge Olin, of Joliet, opened the afternoon session.

The committee on resolutions gave most cordial support to the various departments of the C. T. U. work—and especially recommended vigorous prosecution of the two lines of work adopted as the special work of the year by the Alton convention—scientific temperance instruction and woman's ballot.

The resolution in reference to the ballot for woman called forth an eloquent and telling plea in its favor from Rev. F. A. Hardin, and by request Mrs. M. B. Willard spoke briefly upon the subject. Our legislative work was next presented by Mrs. Willard.

The children's mass meeting at four o'clock was the event of the convention. Mrs. Nellie Bayley so delighted her audience, which filled the spacious auditorium of Ottawa Street M. E. church to overflowing, that arrangements were at once made for her return in two weeks.

Mrs. Marsh, president of the Joliet Union, presided at the closing session Wednesday evening. Rev. F. A. Hardin followed the opening devotional exercises with a presentation of the W. C. T. U. work that opened hearts and pocket books, and $100 was placed at the disposal of of the eighth district W. C. T. U. The address of the evening was given by Mrs. Mary B. Willard.

An "after meeting" with the young ladies was requested by them that a Y. W. C. T. U. might be organized. This meeting was adjourned for two weeks when Miss Hood is expected to meet with and organize the young ladies of Joliet. A Band of Hope will also be organized, as deep and widespread interest in the work among the children was awakened by the convention.

ILLINOIS NOTES.

—The W. C. T. U. of DuPage county will meet in convention at Wheaton, March 19, during the day and evening. Miss Willard gives an address in the evening at the college chapel.

—A union has been organized among the colored people of Decatur by Mrs. Lucy Simpson, with Mrs. Belle Woodford, as president, and Miss Birdie Miller as corresponding secretary.

—A few towns in Illinois have been fortunate in securing engagements from ex-Governor St. John, of Kansas, for addresses during the last of March, and first part of April. He is to speak at Chicago, March 23; Eureka, March 25; Quincy, April 1; Monmouth, April 2; Geneseo, April 3; Rochelle, April 4; Rockford, 5. He is also to speak at Bloomington and Alton. A few more dates can be secured by writing at once to Mrs. G. H. Read, of Bloomington, who is arranging for the little trip in Illinois. Gov. St. John is a power as a prohibition speaker, and those are fortunate who have the opportunity to hear him.

INDIANA.

At Wabash March 4, 1884, a faithful worker in the W. C. T. U. died suddenly. Mrs. Henrietta D., wife of Dr. A. J. Smith, in her fifty-fourth year. Her husband, five children, and this community, mourn the close of this noble life. A life filled with good works, in which "she hath done what she could." By the folding of these dear hands much work will be left undone, but that is the Lord's, and remains to us as her legacy, for completion. She has earned her "Well done good and faithful servant enter thou into the joys of thy Lord." E.

MISSOURI.

Sarcoxie.—Mrs. M. M. Clardy organized a W. C. T. U. with five members the 12th of December. J. C. Holt re-organized December 31 with twenty-six members; also organized a C. T. U. and Band of Hope with National Cadets. Saturday afternoon of each week is given to instruction in Julia Colman's catechism and cadet drill. A temperance mass meeting is held every Friday evening. Such a public sentiment has been built up by the labors of Holt and Critchfield that one of our saloons closed on the 7th of February and the other bids fair to follow. Jasper county is elected for prohibition.

MRS. HOFFMAN'S APPOINTMENTS.

March 19, Wellington, Mo.; March 20 and 21, Lexington, Mo.; March 23, Brunswick, Mo.; March 24 and 25, Paris, Mo.; March 27 and 28, Monroe City, Mo.; March 29 and 30, Shelbina, Mo.; April 3 and 4, Brookfield, Mo.

NEWS IN A NUTSHELL.

Of Francis Murphy's work in Lowell, Mass., we have the following: Mr. Murphy is doing grand and effective work on the old line of gospel temperance. He is daily attracting great crowds limited only by the size of the public buildings, and arousing the whole community to an unprecedent interest in the cause he advocates. He is exerting an influence that gives a positive and powerful religious tone to the whole movement, and is winning large numbers to a life of sobriety. Mr. Murphy begins his work in Manistee, Mich., the 23d inst.

The women of Ulster county, (N. Y.) may be said to have seized the demon of intemperance by the throat. The matrons have pledged themselves to neither buy nor sell of a man who drinks, who sells drinks or who holds that it is defensible to do either. The young women have signed a pledge which binds them to avoid speaking to all young men who cannot put themselves right on the total abstinence question. These determined women will make no exception on account of social position, wealth, genius or influence.

As a result of special services held by the Cincinnati W. C. T. U. in Lytle Hall over fifty conversions are reported. In connection with these meetings, though not directly a supplement to the temperance work of the union, is a Bible class, having for its leader Mr. Abner L. Frazer. The class has grown to number between fifty or sixty, and is attended by persons ranging from twenty to seventy years of age. It meets at 2:30 o'clock Sunday afternoon

The W. C. T. U. of Ontario (Canada) gave the Sanitary convention, which met at Ottawa the past week, the following very pertinent and important questions: Is the beverage use of alcoholic liquors by persons in health beneficial? Is the indiscriminate use of alcoholic liquors by persons not in health, even if on prescription, beneficial? Is alcoholic liquor, as obtained in common sale, necessary in medicinal prescriptions? If so, in what cases particularly?

At the close of Geo. Woodford's work in Springfield, Mo., the W. C. T. U. had increased in membership from twenty-five to one hundred and twenty-five. A Y. W. C. T. U. had been organized, also a Band of Hope numbering six hundred or more. Over one thousand have taken the pledge and the saloon men are crying hard times.

From California we have the good news that the Cadets of Temperance or Cadets in Blue, as in some towns they wish to be called, are being drilled for future action. In Oakland a military man is employed that the drill may be most thorough. Santa Cruz reports a large number of boys drilling enthusiastically.

At Oskaloosa (Iowa) the W. C. T. U. are in the midst of a glorious revival, conducted by I. H. Douglas, the Quaker Moody. Over fifty conversions in a little over a week, and many more souls brought out into gospel liberty.

Hughes and Ward held a ten days revival in Bellevue Mich., in December, under the auspices of the W. C. T. U.; the workers were revived and nearly six hundred signatures to the pledge obtained.

The Minnesota W. C. T. U. celebrated Washington's birthday by holding five conventions in as many congressional districts. The home protection party is organizing fast all over the state.

Forty accessions to the church is the result of Alexander Cooper's work at Sandwich. He opened a series of meetings at Momence on Sunday evening, with a crowded house.

REPORT OF COMMITTEE APPOINTED AT DETROIT ON "DER BAHNBRECHER."

The committee to prepare a report on the relation of the W. C. T. U. and Der Bahnbrecher has met with delays entirely beyond control, hence the lapse of time in offering the following for the consideration of local unions:

There is a wide difference of understanding between Prof. Schmitz and ourselves as to how fully states have met their obligations as involved in the resolution adopted at Louisville, and how much of the sum pledged by the executive committee of the German national union has been paid. This arises from the fact that each claims Mr. Schumacher's donation as being for themselves. But Mr. Schumacher states definitely to us that his contribution was intended to relieve Ohio W. C. T. U. of its share of the burden, hence we so credit it.

But Prof. Schmitz continued the publication of Der Bahnbrecher as long as he possibly could, being under the impression the part of the German organization had been fulfilled by the donation of Mr. Schumacher and he depended in full faith on what he supposed would be due from the W. N. C. T. U. Hence we hope no imputation may rest upon our unions, and that in this case they may do more than their duty. Several states have fully paid up their respective quotas in accordance with the Louisville resolution and your committee recommend that in those states which has not done so, one dollar be given by each local union as recommended by the convention held at Detroit. This should be sent to the state treasurer to be forwarded by her to Prof. Schmitz, to be used in payment of debts as incurred in publication of Der Bahnbrecher whilst he supposed it to be entitled to funds from our organization.

Respectfully submitted,

Esther Pugh,
Isabella H. Irish,
Ellen J. Phinney,
Mary M. Hobbs.

ANNOUNCEMENTS.

Headquarters National W. C. T. U., 16 East 14th street, New York.

ANOTHER Special Offer.

Arrangements have been made with the publishers by which we are enabled to offer Tunison's Matchless, Historical County, Railroad, Distance and Index Map of the United States, and Illustrated Map of the World, as a Premium upon exceptionally good terms.

A double map, about four by five feet in size, mounted on rollers, bound with tape, colored, varnished and finished in the highest style of the art, with reversible attachment; shows the states on the largest scale possible to give the whole United States on one sheet. The counties are about one inch square, each in separate color, and the names are bold and plain. With each map is supplied, free of cost, a copy of "Tunison's Rapid County Finder, or Index," giving complete index of position and population of every county in the United States, by a superior method, used and adopted in the official publications of the government.

The style of engraving has never before been equaled; the names of the counties and county seats stand out bold and plain, and the diamond lettering enables us to show thousands of stations and postoffices not shown in other maps.

The map was constructed by the most accomplished draughtsmen and engravers, is based on government surveys, official railroad information, and its accuracy is unequaled, four to twenty years newer in design, possessing every quality and merit, and justly deserves the character expressed in its title, "matchless, historical, county, railroad, distance and index map."

This map shows all the new counties correct to date, including the thirty-two (32) new counties made last year. It also shows where every tribe of Indians is located, and gives the number inhabiting each reservation. Also shows all the new western surveys, mining towns and stage stations, and every post office in the west.

The rivers are double lined as far as navigable, enabling us to tell how far boats can ascend any river.

This is also a complete railroad and distance map, giving the names of the railroads printed on them, so we can tell what railroad to take to go to any town or place, and the distance is marked between the stations with figures; thus we can find the shortest route, cost of travel, and exact distance between any two places.

On the reverse side are three complete maps of the world, also separate maps of Europe, Egypt and the Holy Land.

The globular map (in hemispheres) shows the world round, as it actually is, and on a flattened scale, as it appears to us in traveling over it. and is one of the latest and best maps of the world published, showing latest discoveries in the Arctic regions, giving the explorations of the "Hall" and the "Herald Jeannette" expeditions, showing the islands discovered and named by them, within 400 miles of the north pole.

We have in this map the ocean routes of inter-communication, with distances marked from port to port; telegraph cables in the different oceans, and the routes of African explorations from the beginning of this century to those of Livingstone and Stanley.

Below the map of the world is a "Chart of the World," on Mercator's projection, showing voyages of discovery from earliest times to the present date. Names of navigators and the date of the voyages are given alongside each route. The degrees of heat and cold are given by Isothermal lines crossing those countries having same average temperature.

The distribution of races of mankind (illustrated by typical heads, in primary and secondary varieties, as taught by Prof. Guyot), is shown by a system of parallel rulings at different angles, covering the face of inhabited countries. The prevailing religions of the various countries are also shown, defined by different colors. Points of greatest depth in the several oceans, from official soundings are shown.

The small globes show the animal and vegetable life of both continents, arranged according to the zones to which they are native, with explanatory text. Bordering the globular map of the world are the eighty-one flags of the world. In the lower left hand quarter is our diamond map of Europe, and in the lower right hand quarter is our topographical map of the Holy Land, with ancient and modern names, showing modern Egypt in detail, railroad system, Suez Canal, Delta of the River Nile, the Sinaitic peninsula, etc. A map of the ancient world shows the travels of St. Paul, as recorded in Holy Writ, besides names and locations of places mentioned in the New Testament, the route of the wanderings of the Israelites from Egypt into Canaan, is shown according to reliable modern Bible scholars.

The columns on the sides show the different coins used in all parts of the world, giving the value of each in United States money. And in the triangular spaces we have a condensed historical and statistical description of the world. The variation of time in different parts of the world is shown by an original system. Clock dials, fifteen degrees apart, show the time of day at all places on those meridians when it is noon at London and "just the way the clocks tick all around the world." At the top are original illustrations showing the costumes, and architectures, also a landscape scene in the principal nations of the world.

This map contains more than 100 illustrations. Among them are views of celebrated palaces, cathedrals, places, etc., of the Old World, and engravings of the government buildings in Washington—capitol, treasury, patent office, postoffice, department of the navy, war, and state, White House, etc., and many engravings of natural scenery, and great engineering works in the United States, with measurements and descriptions. No brief description can do this great work justice. But you can see this map is far ahead of all others. The publisher claims ten improvements: First, the distance marked between stations; second, names on the railroads; third, small towns given; fourth, the new counties; fifth, the new surveys; sixth, the "sea shell" tint colors; seventh eighth, three maps of the world; rivers double lined as far as navigable; ninth, separate maps of Egypt, the Holy Land and Europe; and tenth, the more than 100 illustrations forming a pictorial history of the world, showing what kind of people inhabit each country, styles of their dress, structures they build, how use they live in; a landscape view in each land; the political subdivisions; prevailing religions; degrees of heat and cold; products and exports; animals common there; the flag of the nation; the coins from lowest to highest denomination, and value of each in our money. Then, with the views of palaces, cathedrals, places, cities, etc., we have a complete pictoral history of the world. Retail price of the Map and Index Book, $4.00.

An ill fed brain learns no lessons, and is excusable if peevish. It gives a more intellectual and happier childhood. ## Signal Notes.

In Germany, where there is no restriction of the sale of liquor on Sunday, statistics show that 32 per cent. of the murders and crimes are committed on Sunday, and 53 per cent. between Saturday and Monday morning. Yet many are clamoring for the German Sunday to be introduced here.—Ex.

A saloon keeper in Miamsburg, Ohio, is circulating his business card, with the following on its back: "To all whom it may concern—Know ye that, by the payment of $225, I am permitted to retail intoxicating liquors at my saloon in this city. To the wife who has a drunkard for a husband, or a friend who is unfortunately dissipated, I say, emphatically, give me notice in person of such case or cases in which you are interested, and all such shall be excluded from my place. Let mothers, fathers, sisters and brothers do likewise, and their requests will be kindly regarded. I pay a heavy tax for the privilege of selling liquors, and I want it distinctly understood that I have no desire to sell to drunkards or minors, or to the poor or destitute."

A large edition of this intensely interesting and instructive book has been placed at our disposal by the publishers, and we are enabled to offer it to ou subscribers at a wonderfully low price.

The author's biographer, speaking of the circumstances under which this book was written, says:

Although cut off by his protracted confinement from all opportunity of public preaching, he was, in the overruling providence of God, more extensively useful than while in the enjoyment of unfettered liberty; for having during his leisure hours exerted the extraordinary talents with which he was endowed, he produced the Pilgrim's Progress—a work which has been more extensively circulated, and done more good in the world than any other book except the Bible alone."

The great popularity of this book is shown in the fact that it has been translated into every language on the continent of Europe.

Miscellaneous Selections.

Drunkards in Germany will for the future be sternly looked after by the state. Each town must keep a record of all the hard drinkers, and the city medical men are bound to report those who habitually imbibe to excess, so that the authorities may subject them to a strict course of treatment.

We append the testimony of Gen. C. H. Howard, because of the esteem and confidence in which he is held, not only by his many friends, but also by the thousands who know him as the recent editor of the Advance, and hence know that only deserved merit alone can influence him in the following statement:

Chicago, Ill., March 4, 1884.—Dr. F. L. Peiro—Dear Sir:—It gives me great pleasure to state that Mrs. Howard's health is permanently restored. You are aware that it was five years ago last November she became prostrated by an attack of Cerebro Spinal Meningitis and that the greater part of this time during all these years she has been in so delicate health as not to be able to attend to the duties of her family and household. Last summer she began the use of your excellent Oxygen treatment by your advice. In a few weeks she was able to take horseback exercise. Her improvement was steady and almost daily perceptible. She soon extended the horseback exercise and by November could prolong it for a full hour at a time without fatigue. So gratifying have been the results of your Oxygen treatment that it seems to be not less than a simple duty, as a debt of gratitude, to give you this statement of facts. Very respectfully yours,

C. H. Howard.

Facts and Reasons.

Effects Produced by AYER'S SARSAPARILLA and by Nothing Else so Perfectly.

It strengthens and invigorates sufferers from enervation, languor, weakness, and mental depression.

It has an almost magical effect in curing eruptive and cutaneous disorders.

It eradicates from the blood the taint of that terribly destructive disease, Hereditary Scrofula.

It expels from the system the baneful poison of Mercury, which is as serious as that of Scrofula.

It purifies and regenerates the life current polluted by the corruption of contagious disease.

It stimulates the secretory organs, effects the removal of all impurities from the blood and makes it new, rich, and pure.

It restores health to sufferers from thin blood and impaired vitality.

It saves, by its thorough purification of the blood, from Rheumatism, Rheumatic Gout, and Tubercular Consumption.

It cures Scrofulous affections of the Liver and Kidneys, and their symptoms, Jaundice and Dropsy.

It cures Scrofulous Catarrh, Itching Humors, and the purulent Sores caused by Scrofula.

It clears and improves the complexion.

It neutralizes the poisons left in the system by Diphtheria and Scarlet Fever, and restores the debilitated patient to perfect health and vigor.

It is, in short, an unfailing remedy for all disorders arising from impurity of the blood, where such disorders have not become so deeply seated as to be beyond all human aid.

Advantages that AYER'S SARSAPARILLA Possesses over all Others.

Public Library Boylston st 20285

It is composed of the most efficacious alterative, diuretic, and tonic drugs known in pharmacy, among which are the genuine Honduras Sarsaparilla, Yellow Dock, Stillingia, and the Iodides of Potassium and Iron.

It is a highly concentrated medicine, scientifically and honestly compounded so as to secure to it the highest degree of activity and perfect uniformity.

It has received the hearty endorsement of the leading men in the medical profession, who recognize it as a standard pharmaceutical preparation, and prescribe it in their practice.

It contains no poisonous minerals or other dangerous drugs, the use of which for temporary effect in the many crude and cheap mixtures sold as alteratives, produces effects on the system often worse than the diseases they are offered to cure.

It costs no more than any other, but would still be the cheapest blood-purifying medicine in the world, even were its price three times greater, since it is the only one that does "real, lasting good."

It has been before the public for nearly forty years, and has constantly grown in popular favor, both at home and abroad, until there is hardly a place in the civilized world where it has not a host of friends, made so by its marvellous cures.

It has been used in, and approved by, at least 4,000,000 families in the United States, and 7,000,000 throughout the world. Women have especial reasons for commending it.

It has proven its potency in curing obstinate, deeply-seated, and long-standing diseases caused by vitiation of the blood. It must not, however, be expected and is not claimed that a single bottle will cure such cases; but patients should persevere in the use of this remedy until a radical cure is effected.

It is the only blood-purifier that has won and retained the confidence of the people of all tropical countries, where such medicines are much required.

It is the only medicine of its class that sailors, as a rule, have any faith in—and they are right.

The Union Signal

OFFICIAL ORGAN OF THE WOMAN'S NATIONAL CHRISTIAN TEMPERANCE UNION.

"Thou hast given a banner to them that fear Thee; that it may be displayed because of the Truth; that Thy beloved may be delivered."

VOL. X.—NO. 13. CHICAGO, MARCH 27, 1884. $1 75 PER YEAR.

THERE are now seventy-three temperance journals in England. How many are there in America?

IN the window of a Cincinnati saloon is a stuffed rattlesnake coiled upon a whisky jug and wreathed in flowers. The proprietor evidently has a correct view of the "fitness of things."

Do you suffer dear worker, for the well doing of the village temperance campaign? Remember,

"Hot grows the fire where wrongs expire" and take courage.

BY a decision of the supreme court of Kansas those who should be prohibitory law enforcers and are not, can be ousted from office. One county has already relieved itself of its traitorous prosecuting attorney, under this ruling.

FOR vigorous law enforcement commend us to the Catholic church whose New Jersey bishop has refused church burial to a member because some three years ago he disobeyed the order of the church prohibiting the sale of liquor on Sunday.

THE woman's suffrage amendment which received such courteous and respectful treatment in the senate of the Iowa legislature, was yesterday (March 25) summarily and indefinitely postponed in the house. A reconsideration was moved at once however and the matter will prob bably come up again.

KANSAS is rapidly gaining by immigration. The "jug trains" are being superseded by the immigrant trains, and all are crowded. One authority says that the state has increased in taxable wealth over thirty millions since the enactment of prohibition.

SAYS Canon Farrar: "The liberty to do wrong is the mother of bondage. No man is free, and no nation is free, which is free from righteousness, and a slave to vice. The impulse of appetite is slavery, and the obedience to salutary restraint is the only liberty."

THE British Medical Temperance Association made a series of philosophical observations during the last week of Weston's total abstinence walk of five thousand miles, a report of which will be looked for with interest as a material aid to the scientific study of the temperance question.

SOMEBODY says that when the digits combine their forces against the liquor traffic, the saloon must go. It looks as if the alphabet were also to be pressed into service, vide the out-hanging sign of a Fifth Avenue saloon which this morning reads as follows:

BUSINESS LUNCH.
ONLY FIFTEEN CENTS FOR A GOOD LUNCH,
WITH A CUP OF COFFEE,
or a Five Cent Glass of Beer.

AS TO the value of an unauthoritative ballot read Mrs. Norton's vivid description of the woman's vote in Kingsbury county, Dakota. If a simultaneous vote of the women of the land on the question of prohibition could be arranged for, we believe a similar result would follow, and that one half of public sentiment would be found on the right side.

THE Illinois W. C. T. U. has published over a million and a half pages of temperance literature since October, and most of it is now in circulation. Frances Power Cobbe says that ink has done more to abridge the empire of the Prince of Darkness than all the holy water of the saints.

IT is said by students of the missionary problem that $700,000,000, would send the gospel to every creature on the known earth. And yet the earnest expectation of the creature waileth for this manifestation of the sons of God, while America staggers under a drink bill of exactly the amount needed to fulfil our Lord's conditions of His second coming and establishment of His kingdom in the earth.

SENATOR BILLS, a republican member of the Iowa legislature is reported as saying in his speech on the suffrage amendment that the republican ship is likely to take on more freight than it can safely carry, "with prohibition in the hold, the tariff amid ships, and woman suffrage on deck." If the republican ship is to be wrecked it will not be on account of this anticipated freightage, but because the noble bark built to carry moral ideas, has of late years been loading up with the heavy bullion of the whisky revenue, while the barnacles of office seeking and holding have been weighting her sides, the worms of false principle eating her timbers amid ships, and the guns of the reformers riddling her sails and crippling the rigging.

A PROHIBITION conference was held in this city last week, with a program of wide-scope and bearing. Many prominent citizens and clergyman took part, also John B. Finch and Miss Frances E. Willard. High license came in for a large share in the discussions, the Rev. Dr. Herrick Johnson throwing the electric light of "clear thought" upon its muddy surface. A number of dubious craft that have been laboriously sculling through its gelatinous "ooze," thinking soon to be in the clear waters of prohibition, began to see their mistake as the keen flashes discovered to them only thicker blackness ahead, and were—at last accounts—by slow degrees, heading back toward the point they started from. Their safe deliverance from the slime and mire of the license pool will be hailed by all their friends and well wishers. We shall publish Dr. Johnson's article in full next week, and shall prepare it for still wider circulation in leaflet form.

STRANGE to say, there are those who contend that the true Froebellian kindergarten has no place in its curriculum for religious instruction. To all such the story of Froebel's own religious child life, just issued by Miss Ross, superintendent of the training school of the free kindergarten association, will come we trust with power and conviction. The story is told by way of preface to a series of attractive Bible lessons for the kindergarten, prepared by Mrs. Virginia J. Kent of Chicago, a child-lover, and exceedingly apt in fitting truth to that expression which shall most surely move the child-heart. Accompanying these lessons is a set of beautifully designed outline cards, each illustrative of the lesson, to be wrought with the needle, or pricked with a pin. There are "The sparrows"—with the text—"Ye are of more value than many sparrows"—"The Good Shepherd"—"The Sower," "The Lily" and some eight more, all full of sound religious teachings and winsome moral precepts. These go into the homes of the children with rare power, as repeated by the childrens' lips. Mothers go hungrily to the teachers saying, "Tell me the story of the wise men and the star—I never heard it before," or with,

"Where do you get all them nice stories you tell to the children?"

"In the Bible."

"Well, where can I get one o' them books?"

Aptly says the teacher, "If such incidents occurred in foreign mission fields, they would be heralded as tokens of a dawning faith." How vastly more pathetic they are uttered in our own Christian land, and how surely they indicate the need of Christian teaching in the free kindergartens.

"THE MASTER CALLETH FOR THEE."

BY MARY E. GRISWOLD.

Through the ripple of the moments,
And the louder surge of years;
Through the prattle of the children
And the grief of woman's tears;
Midst the thunder of the battle
When peace crowns the bitter strife,
Everywhere, the Master calleth
Wooing to the better life.

Are there sick hearts? see! He poureth
Evermore the healing balm,—
And to those who conquer evil
Gives the victor's fadeless palm.
Lo! the fields are white with harvest
Waiting for the sickle's gleam;
(Days of sowing then the reaping,
With faith's trusting song between.)

Will you hear his silver accents,
Answer "Father here am I!"
Bear aloft the temperance banner
While the eager throng press by?
Hopeless wives, and sad-eyed children
Reaching mute, despairing hand,
Pleading ever "prohibition,"
Work for "God—Home—Native Land."

Alameda, March 7, 1884.

WOMAN AND TEMPERANCE.

ANNUAL ADDRESS OF MRS. JUDGE MERRICK BEFORE THE LOUISIANA W. C. T. U.

Sisters of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union, Ladies and Gentlemen: Geologists have told us about the differentand long periods of time required for the formation of this planet on which we live. They have proved that trees and plants existed a long while before the flowers, and demonstrated that a subsequent and comparatively recent age produced butterflies and bees.

Thus we are taught that nothing in all nature appears before it is wanted and called for, and that everything has a purpose, and when that is accomplished, it dies or disappears. Now if you believe that the intelligent superintendence which regulates the material world extends also to the affairs of humanity, you will not suffer yourselves to be agitated or disturbed about the position we occupy tonight, for it will seem to be in perfect harmony and absolute accordance with the eternal fitness of things that, in the evolution of the ages, woman should add her voice to that of the great multitude of good and true men who are calling for the protection of our nation from the evils of intemperance.

We have learned in the school of experience, that successful teacher even of fools, that it requires courage of a rare and heroic quality, like that which animated martyrs of old, to stand up in a public place like this and advocate the cause which has brought together our convention. To the casual observer we may appear presumptuous in supposing that any good will be the result of the counsel we have called of the women of Louisiana upon this momentous subject. In fact, an intelligent gentlemen whom the most dignified matron in this city would fail to awe into silent veneration said to us, "Why do you not get after people who eat too much, for, said he, gormandizing is a very common offense, and is equally ruinous as drink to the human constitution."

We replied that no amount of food, even the richest dishes that Francatelli ever compounded for Queen Victoria's table, could incite a man to abuse or maltreat his family, but stimulating drinks sometimes, and on some people, had this very objectionable effect.

"I see," was his reply; "liquor makes the home unpleasant, and you women don't enjoy that, so you have got up a great society among yourselves to put an end to the liquor traffic. And this, I suppose, is the outgrowth of your higher education and improved esthetic tastes; but you can never accomplish your purpose while we hold the purse." You cannot carry any important point in this world without money, ladies. Here I am reminded of the subject of finance, of which we are commonly supposed to be utterly ignorant. In our union, thus far, we have been able to meet all our obligations like men. And if we could not compete with that wonderful French woman you read about, who could give an elegant entertainment on three lemons, still we can truthfully say we have done much with very small means.

Our membership fees at present barely cover our incidental expenses, leaving us nothing to pay for the extension of our work; therefare, I would recommend that we shall in future double the sum, making it equal to that of our honorary members.

We have been frequently assured when business men fully understand our purposes and plans, and how disinterestedly we have sought to promote the public good, that they would generously give us all we need, just as they contribute with princely liberality to other charitable and philanthropic organizations. If they would do this without first requiring solicitation and person entreaty, how grateful we should be.

Some of you ladies, after years of housekeeping, will let your forgetful or pre-occupied husbands march off down town in the morning without calling him back to replenish your empty purse, and when he returns to his home he finds his favorite dishes all the same, and these housekeepers are not angels, they are the refined and delicate creatures who know how to cook, women of resource, who are never at their wits' end in any emergency, for their wit has no end. They are women who believe the sphere of their duty is only limited by the sphere of their capacity. We have great cause of congratulation on account of our friendly relations to gentlemen of the press, not only in this city, but throughout the state, and nation. They have nobly aided us in all directions.

Ministers of the churches also give us aid and encouragement. They pray for us. (God bless the preachers.) They tell us they wonder why we did not engage in this work before, for we have ever been the greatest sufferers from this gigantic evil.

Not a single preacher has ever told us to suffer on and say nothing—that was the womanly thing to do; but, on the contrary, we have been admonished in strong language that "for the final success of this cause we must continue to pray, plan and push and persevere, for the day of better things is already beginning to dawn." A gifted doctor of divinity said these words to us on our crusade anniversary. Can we ever forget them? The very cream of the churches, the active members, gravitate naturally toward us, and a pleasant spirit of Christian unity seems to pervade our ranks, instead of the old time sectarian narrowness.

Why some of us once thought that Mr. Wesley, that good and great man, had gone ahead and pre-empted for us and our children, with indisputed right and title, some of the very best places in heaven, and when in the progress of events we arrived there we fully expected to sit down for all eternity in ease and comfort, right in his Methodist corner. We now have a different idea. We expect to join in the universal harmony of the songs of praise before the great white throne. We may not with our different voices sing the very same part, but we think we shall accord together, and make a grand harmony—so we are practicing a prelude here—for the great hereafter which John saw in his vision!

A lady asked one of our members how she could find the time to attend so many meetings of our union, with her large family of children. Her reply was, "I take the time for the sake of my children."

The mother of the Gracchi made no nobler reply to the woman matron when asked to display her jewels.

I do not think the labors of our temperance workers represent neglected home duties, for, with the enlargement of our mental and moral horizon, we learn that it is necessary to make home happy for those we love, by banishing dullness and insipidity, and bringing in an amiable and agreeable cheerfulness.

Dear ladies, we can assure any of you who wish to join us tonight that your husbands will have more affection for you than ever, and your dear children will have the very same attachment, and we will do you good.

True, we cannot boast that bonfires are lighted in our honor, or knights in glittering armor are ready to march out to the sound of trumpets to do battle in this cause, but we have what is better. We are surrounded by staunch and true friends—men wise and strong who are ready to become a good and reliable committee of responsibility, who, while we carry on this work, will be sure to see to it that no harm shall befall us.

The first thing to be done here in Lousiana is to collect the children and organize them into bands of hope, and to this end we must have a superintendent of scientific temperance instruction, who is capable of directing the work for the state through the local unions. It would be her duty to secure a hearing for this theme before all gatherings of teachers, in institutes and conventions. In order to act judiciously she should be familiar with the school laws of this state. She should endeavor to secure the sympathy and co-operation of all moral and religious assemblies, therefore we should try to present this phase of temperance effort before church conferences, synods and associations as opportunity affords.

Our aim is to secure such legislation as will place the study of the nature and effects of alcoholic drinks, stimulants and narcotics upon the human system, with other required studies under state control. Law is said to be embodied sentiment. We cannot expect legislators to write laws upon our statute-book which public sentiment does not sustain.

Not much more than one-fifth of the people of this state live in cities. In every parish which sends senators and representatives to the legislature we should have an efficient union organized, through which our able superintendent of this department could work and try to influence our law-makers to vote for temperance education in public schools. Vermont, New Hampshire and Michigan have already enacted temperance education bills, and such a bill has recently passed one house in the general assembly of the state of New York—and this has been done largely, if not entirely, by the efforts of the Woman's Christian Temperance Unions.

We should begin now to urge and agitate this question in the parishes where the majority of the voters of the state reside, for it is a truth often enunciated to us that the education of the people is the antidote for the vice of intemperance.

The late movement here in New Orleans to introduce in the schools instruction in physiology and hygiene is directly in line with this the most important department of our work.

Let us be like the wise woman who builds her house. Let us begin with our little ones—even in the cradle, for we know that we ourselves constitute their first lesson. We know that mothers themselves are the books they soonest read, and as the alphabet forms the elements of all written language, so does her thoughts and acts and what the mother is, constitute and develop the future character of the little darlings who cling so closely to her in all the first years of their fragile young lives! Let us join hands, dear sisters, in a united, honest endeavor to make this a better country, withholding nothing, and doing everything with that unselfish devotion which ever characterizes every truly great soul.

And if we are not yet ready to teach the "Temperance Lesson Book" of the great chemist, Dr. Benjamin Ward Richardson, you can get Julia Colman's "Juvenile Temperance Manual," and show the children blackboard pictures teaching that alcohol is a poison and tobacco in any form is injurious to them, and profanity is degrading and odious. We can teach them that the body must be kept clean and pure, for it is the temple of the Holy Ghost; that we are not our own, but have been bought with a price. And if we are constant in season and out of season and faithful, we shall, by a slow and sure process, train up a set of men temperate, honest, clear-headed, who will, when they step into power and place, rule this city and state in the interest of good morals, and with all the decency becoming a Christian community in the twentieth century.

I think we may educate our boys so that they will not think it right to make compromise with profanity, alcohol, nicotine, vice or crime, not even to obtain means to support public education, or to maintain hospitals, almshouses, or any other charitable institutions.

The responsibilities of mothers are heavy, and fathers have also an equal share, though many times they are unwilling to recognize the fact.

A Band of Hope, numbering forty, was gathered up and for some time instructed in the chapel of a church in this city by the president of the Young Woman's Christian Temperance Union. They were doing admirably until they were excluded because it was feared they might soil or deface the chapel!

We have never since been able to collect that number of children together in that same locality.

Some Christians are far seeing and they send missionaries to foreign lands, and some too near-sighted to realize that we have ignorance, bigotry, indifference and intolerance to recover and contend with right here in this Christian city!

Oh! my brethren, suffer the little children to come into your churches under our instruction—they belong to Christ—and after you and I are laid away in the dust they are to fill our vacant places.

Some of us have cradled two generations in our arms and our grandmotherly hearts are just as tender to all young children as when after long hours of agonizing anguish, we clasped in an ecstacy of heavenly joy and thankfulness, our own God-given first born!

When the Savior girded himself with a napkin and washed the feet of His disciples, we learned this practical object lesson in humanity by heart.

Not for a moment could we expect one of you, gentlemen, would cross the threshhold of a drunkard's home to cheer up his sick wife or wash the soiled and tear-stained faces of his hungry children. While we own up to a natural abhorrence of this sin, whether found in palace or hovel, we are able and willing to try to rescue and comfort the sinner. But as we do this work, we draw nearer the "Rock of our strength." We are feeble creatures who grow strong only when we lean upon the Rock of Ages.

We shall be a long time in reaching the place occupied by the northern states on this question. There is little Rhode Island, with a population only a little larger than New Orleans, with thirty unions, while the state of Ohio has 500. But there is a perceptible movements all along our borders. Wherever our flag is carried, the women come to the front.

In Arkansas women have been permitted to vote on this question by signature and they have almost made it a prohibition state.

Let us not set down quietly here in Louisiana complacently contemplating our dozen unions and 1,000 members, nor must we count up those on the other side, asking, with faithless heart, "Can the Lord set a table in the wildernes," but make it our chief business to enlarge our borders.

And when your delegates to our national convention, at St. Louis, are called up to report from Louisiana, they will have a cheering word to say.

We have great satisfaction to inform you we have a superintendent of Sabbath-schools; one who is by natural gifts and graces well calculated to advance this branch of our work.

Our speakers are well received and the country parishes are all alive to this subject, so much so hitherto we have not been able to respond to their calls for help.

A dear old friend of mine from the state of Mississippi said to me, "Don't go and abuse the saloon-keepers," for, said she, "I think many of them are good men. I have found them to be very generous, and even more ready to help the poor than our own church members."

I told her we never abused anybody, for on our tongue was the law of kindness. We should give even our enemy bread to eat if he were hungry, and if he were thirsty we should give him the same article with which we regaled our friends—water to drink.

Still I thought no one need be hurt if I said that we all should be very glad and thankful to hear that all the liquor dealers had determined to abandon that business and engage in something else more congenial to good people.

Perhaps they think they perform a service to society by furnishing the material to carry off the worthless and criminal classes, weeding out the world's too crowded garden by strychnine, logwood, tannin, and prussic acid mixed up with alcohol, which are said to compose the adulterated fluids for which poor people and others squander their hard earnings. A guest at a temperance dinner whispered fretfully to his next neighbor, "At this rate these fanatics will soon say we must dispense with mustard in our roast beef." The lady replied, "If taking too much mustard on roast beef had saddled this country with taxes, disrupted its homes, emptied its churches and crowded its jails and poor-houses to overflowing, I think I would be willing to take my roast beef without any mustard to the end of time." That, however was a woman's logic.

We truly regret that our national president is absent—the woman we all love and revere for her devotion to the cause. Yes, she devotes herself and immolates her friends on the same sacrificial altar.

You may refuse to be offered up and be looking for some way of escape, but it will be in vain if you once trust yourself within the charmed circle of her influence. You all know about the great maelstrom on the coast of Norway, where ships, sailing too near, are said to be drawn in to their destruction. Our dear Miss Willard is a regular temperance whirlpool. It is not surprising that she should take in a small craft like mine, for I have seen stately vessels, well manned, with costly rigging and gay colors flying in the summer breeze, strike their colors and surrender to the same attraction.

Women who never before had courage to say a grace over their dinner, have been won over to enlist in this enterprise, which she says "will put to their mettle the strongest brains no less than the truest hearts."

If a ship in mid-ocean should spring a leak and after the men had toiled and exhausted themselves in fruitless efforts, would they think it unwomanly in the women to come down to the pumps and help to save the vessel?

We are all in the same boat and there is a fearful hole in the ship and the men have been working away lo, this long time, and it gets no smaller and the waves are coming faster and faster. We have come to help to keep off the last dire calamity.

We come for the sake of those dearer to us than our own lives. We may not perform faultless work, for we are not accustomed to our tools, but we pray to our God to pity and relieve us according to His tender mercy and loving kindness. Think you we are not heard? One hundred thousand praying women sending up their cries and tears to heaven. How can we fail?

Some of us are weak with age, and some of us are weak with youth, and none of us are overwise, and all of us are only women. But there are a good many of us and our numbers are increasing, and we have faith in God. Even the ancients knew that "they can conquer who believe they can." Therefore be of good courage, dear sisters, and let us do our duty regardless of the applause of men.

Let us bravely shoulder our cross no matter how heavy, and take our places in the Lord's procession of pilgrims to the Celestial City, for most assuredly we, too, have an appointed place somewhere.

Hear me, brethren. I think when our Savior, dying on the cross, commended the mother who bore Him to the love and care of His well-beloved disciple in that thoughtful act he commended all mothers to the kindly care of His followers in all ages. He remembered the woman who stood by Him.

Jews were wrought to cruel madness,
Christians fled in fear and sadness;
Mary stood the cross beside;
At its foot her foot she planted;
By the awful scene undaunted;
'Till the gentle sufferer died.

Poets oft have sung her story;
Painters wreathed her brow with glory;
Priests her name have deified;
But no worship, song, or glory,
Touches like the simple story—
Mary stood the cross beside.

And when under fierce oppression
Goodness suffers like transgression—
Christ again is crucified,
Yet if LOVE be there true-hearted,
By no fear or terror parted,
Mary stands the cross beside!

A NOBLE LIFE.

The faithful attendant of Cyrus L. Blanchard in his last long illness has written to the bereaved parents this simple sketch of the later years of this Christian lawyer. The fact that he was the sworn ally of the W. C. T. U. and its regular attorney, as well as the wide acquaintance and renown of his venerable father, gives a general interest to the transcription:

DEAR PRESIDENT AND MRS. BLANCHARD:—It gives me great pleasure to comply with your request to recount a few of the many words that your son, CYRUS LOUIS, uttered before and during his last illness, in regard to his hope in Christ Jesus. It would probably not be out of place to mention that after having been with him constantly for some months before his illness, and attending him during the same; I am brought to the conclusion, not alone by his words, but by his every day life, that he had a deep Christian experience.

In his practice in Chicago he used frequently to say when fighting for right and justice (and I never knew him to work for anything else), "If the Lord will do this," or, "The Lord has helped me today in court," or, "I will trust in God to help me show the right." And I never knew him to take a case without praying over it.

When he had succeeded, and he usually did, he always said, "God gave success today."

When he returned from his last trip to New York, where he gained a more brilliant victory than the most sanguine of his friends had hoped for him, defeating three or four lawyers who were employed against him, and completely outstripping attorneys who had made a life study of the special kind of litigation in which they were engaged; after all this the first words he spoke to me in reply to the question how he had succeeded, were, "The Lord was with me and enabled me to secure some splendid testimony."

Shortly after this he came from the city feeling very weak. It was prayer meeting night, and he said, "If I am able to go to Chicago I can go to prayer meeting." He loved to attend these meetings and was much benefited by all of them, but especially so this time. The next Sabbath evening he was much depressed and hardly able to be out of doors; yet he went to church, and when he came home his face was bright and he exclaimed with much feeling, "Oh I am so glad I went to church; I am so much better. The text was 'Rejoice with those that do rejoice and weep with those that weep.' The pastor spoke so well, and it did me so much good." This was the last time he attended church; and I never before saw him so much moved by a religious service.

I stayed with him most of the time after that. The first time we were alone he spoke of visiting Jerry Macauly's Mission while in New York. He said, "I sat and listened to that good man speaking and I had to weep; the tears ran down my face freely. I wanted to leave everything and give my whole life to the work of saving poor souls."

His heart was tender and his love for humanity was great and reached even to the lowest, for I seldom was with him upon the streets of Chicago when he did not speak pitifully of those degraded in sin whom he chanced to meet. Often did he take cases without hopes of pay, and never did he allow the poor and weak to suffer if he could help it. He frequently spoke of the inmates of the hospital and went in person to try and help them if it was possible.

A few days previous to taking his bed he spoke to me about going south, thinking that the warm climate would restore his health. His words were, "We will stay in the south until I am well then we will go and preach to the poor heathen."

In his sickness he seemed to be resigned to the will of God and prayed very much. He said at one time, "I am perfectly willing to go if God wants me to." At another time, "I want to do the work that Jesus has for me to do. I will do it if Christ makes the path plain." When in great pain he would sometimes moan, and then would pray for patience and grace to help him bear the affliction. He manifested much anxiety about the salvation of his unconverted neighbors; and would always speak about religion to those who came to see him while sick. He loved to read the Scriptures and often repeated hymns from Cowper and Watts.

By his request several young men were accustomed to come and pray with him Wednesday evenings. At one time after they had sung the hymn "Bringing in the Sheaves," he remarked with much feeling, "Oh I want to have some sheaves when I go to meet Jesus, I don't want to go with my hands empty."

Those who associated with him the most have said to me that an hour never passed in his company without much benefit.

The last time he spoke about business and his plans for the future he prefaced it with the remark, "If the good Lord restores my health."

The good Lord did not restore him but we know that he has gone to Jesus on whom he believed and whom he faithfully served.

May the Savior who has taken your son comfort and keep you both until the pearly gates open and you meet around the throne of God to go no more out forever.

With love and sympathy I am your brother in Christ,

F. A. Shaver.

TRIBUTE OF THE CENTRAL W. C. T. U. OF CHICAGO, BY MRS. T. B. CARSE.

When the Central W. C T. U. two or three years ago undertook the prosecution of saloon keepers for selling liquor to drunkards, Mr. Blanchard was our lawyer; he carried on the suits with marked ability, and with a zeal which was born of hatred of that which was evil, and which must have won success if it had been possible to get justice, but under the present pernicious system of saloon juries this was out of the question in Chicago and we had to abandon the undertaking.

When women crushed and broken hearted from the effects of homes destroyed by the curse of strong drink, sought our help and desired redress through the law, a note from us to Mr. Blanchard asking aid for the unfortunates (who almost always were penniless) would meet with a warm response. I have never known him to turn his back upon cases of this kind because they had no money with which to pay him. Their cases were looked after as closely and argued with as much ability as those of his richest clients, and what was more, he almost always won his suit.

As I write there rise before me the sad faces of a number of friendless women in whose behalf he used his brilliant talents and gained redress for them at the hands of the law. Their gratitude to him was unbounded,—many of them have said to me, "I shall never forget Mr. Blanchard's kindness, and while I live I shall pray God's blessing to rest upon him."

"Whom the gods love die young," but if life is to be counted by deeds not years, Cyrus L. Blanchard was ripe for Death's sickle.

A RACY LETTER.

COL. BAIN: MORE SOUVENIRS: A SENATOR'S WIFE: PRESIDENTIAL CONVENTION.

Dear Union Signal:—The cause of temperance has taken a long stride forward in our city since the coming of Col. Bain, March 2. At two of his lectures, the first and last, one thousand persons were in attendance, and on the second evening, very nearly that number. Every one was delighted and instructed. The commodious gallery was filled with the future hope of the country—the boys from twelve to fifteen years of age; and a more attentive set of hearers cannot be imagined. Not a whisper was heard from them, and they watched the speaker intently as if drinking in every word.

This episode is mentioned because these same boys have filled that same gallery on other occasions in the interests of different causes, and have invariably disturbed the meetings by inattention and talking, inasmuch that it has been necessary to seat older persons at intervals in the attempt to preserve order among them.

But there was no necessity for such action in this instance. Col. Bain certainly exercises wonderful power over his hearers, and rivets the attention not only of adults, but young people, showing that even they, with their elders, are ready to be instructed on this great question of the day and hour, and to learn the best means of ridding the country of this dread evil, from one who has given the subject much attention and study.

In the preface to his closing lecture he invited the ladies of Springfield to meet with the W. C. T. U. at their next regular meeting, the following Thussday. As a result the room would scarcely hold all who came. Ten new members were added to the union and others promised to join. It is the old story—abstinence from cider being included in the pledge deters many from handing in their names.

At our next meeting we are going to have something said about "Satan's Kindling Wood," hoping and praying that the eyes of some, yea, all, may be opened so that they may make a full surrender of all that may make their brother to offend, or create a taste in themselves for something stronger.

I wonder how many of the sisterhood have followed the example of Mrs. Johnson, Miss Willard and Mrs. Judge Thompson, in sending some highly prized possession to headquarters, to be sold at auction for the benefit of the national treasury of the W. C. T. U.? We are so apt to judge others by ourselves, that I imagine the great majority of our women have done as I have,—neglected sending.

As soon as I read of the sacrifice our noble leader made in parting with her treasured "prize cup", I at once determined to send something. But alas! I possess no silver cup, never having taken but one prize and that a book, offered to a class in elocution long years ago. Books do not stand the wear and tear of years as do silver cups, so that sacrifice was not fitting to be made. The next dearest to my heart, at all suitable for sending, I bethought me was a couple of silver nut-picks, once the possession of a dear aunt now in glory. Here would indeed be a sacrifice, something so necessary to acceptable giving, and it was my intention to send them to Miss Pugh at once. But not until today did they leave their long abiding place and start to the great city of New York which by the way, was the old home of their original possessor, and the place where they were purchased by her. And now, dear readers of The Union Signal (all but Miss Willard, who I trust will not listen) can we not devise some means by which the cup she sent can be purchased at this grand auction and returned to her? It must not go into stranger hands. Some of us who are so fortunate as to be present can surely devise some means by which it can be restored to her. Of course she made a full and free surrender of the precious treasure and does not dream of its return, but let us see to it that a pleasant surprise is given her after the sale is over.

Of course all welcomed the annual reports and unite in heaping much well-merited praise upon dear Miss Hood's devoted head. What a worker she is to be sure! A little praise publicly administered will not hurt her. It would be very wonderful and differ from all other annual reports if entirely free from error. Mrs. Emma Derry is corresponding secretary of the Central Union, Springfield, instead of the undersigned. This is mentioned that correspondents may address her on business concerning that union.

It was gratifying to see the article on street car distribution of literature, by Mrs. J. F. Willing, recently in The Union Signal. Pardon the mentioning that for eight years past I have thus distributed papers not only on the street cars, but in stairways while passing along, hoping and praying they would fall into the hands and meet the eyes of those who needed reading matter, and I must add there is considerable satisfaction in such work. It has never been mentioned publicly before, and would not be now, but for Mrs. Willing's article, and the hope that others who have not practised this manner of sowing the seed may be led to adopt it. Some will surely fall into good ground and spring up and bear fruit for the Master.

In conclusion let me tell you a bit of good news from the national capitol. Mrs. Senator Cullom, in reply to a letter written her by her sister, Mrs. P. A. Dorwin, president of our Central Union, asking what she does at the state dinners in the White House with the six wine glasses at her plate, said, "I always leave them turned down." She further stated that the last time she dined at the White House Senator Wilson was her escort to the table, and his glasses, also, remained turned down. We cannot forbear three cheers for Mrs. Senator Cullom! May others follow her example. With such a wife and possessing such sterling qualities as he does, I am sure the W. C. T. U. of the land would not object to Senator Cullom occupying the presidential chair. We would be sure of at least one important thing, namely, that wine would be banished from the White House.

Ever yours in the work,

Mrs. G. C. Smith,

Cor. Sec. North Springfield Union.

HOW TO WIN A VICTORY.

Dear Union Signal.—Just now our hearts are full of praise to our God for this wonderful victory in New York, the triumphant passage of the temperance education bill, through the senate with a vote of twenty-seven for to seven against, and last week through the assembly with only two adverse votes, and only needing the governor's signature to become the law. In a late note Mrs. Hunt says: "We are turning the tide of popular enthusiasm on the governor and we do not think he will veto the bill."

Just now—dear Union Signal—and without Mrs. Hunt's knowledge, we feel like telling your readers something of the story of this struggle ending so grandly for God and the children.

When at the annual meeting the New York state W. C. T. U. decided to work this year for the law which makes compulsory the study of scientific temperance in the public schools it was with great unanimity and enthusiasm that they sent forth Miss Greenwood as superintendent, Mrs. Alford as secretary and Mrs. Hunt as lecturer on this work. It was with many fears these ladies entered the field. The country towns, when once they understood its provisions, could be trusted to favor this law. But in the larger towns, where the liquor interests are so powerful, no one could measure the force and the power of the opposition. Not without a struggle, and a hard struggle would the brewers consent that the children should be taught in the public schools as says Prof. Willard Parker: 1st. What alcohol is. 2d. What alcohol will do to us if we drink it. 3d. What it will make us do. That even their beloved beer is a poison. Miss Greenwood in her department, Mrs. Alford at her desk, and Mrs. Hunt in the field, these women moved forward trusting in God to do battle for the children.

In the months of November and December Mrs. Hunt went up and down among the northern towns, and in the Adirondacks, visiting legislators at their homes, arousing the enthusiasm of the people and gaining hosts of friends for the bill; running down into the central cities for a speech now and then; working steadily, speaking almost nightly, until, as you, dear Union Signal, aptly expressed it, the whole region was buzzing with scientific temperance.

In January the state committee, with Mrs. Hunt, went to Albany. From there Mrs. Hunt writes: "Our bill is fairly launched on its perilous passage." These friends did not stop to lobby in Albany, but Mrs. Hunt went back to the people. She worked harder, if possible, than before, at one time, she writes, speaking sixteen consecutive nights save one.

In February this bill passed the senate, twenty-seven for to seven against. The brewers were now aroused. Their craft was in danger. "It was the brewers versus the children," and as Mrs. Hunt wrote we feared the brewers would win. But still the good work went on. The enthusiasm, great before, was now at fever heat. All along the great central towns, and up and down the Hudson, Mrs. Hunt spoke to crowded houses. At Poughkeepsie an audience of one thousand, and at Auburn fifteen hundred people gave a unanimous rising vote when asked if they would instruct their legislators to vote for this bill. In her last note home Mrs. Hunt says: "Our bill goes on its final passage this week. We have more than enough votes promised to carry it. It may be decided before this letter reaches you." Still Mrs. Hunt spoke nightly. Friends waited and prayed. For days no news, then the rumor, "The temperance education bill lost by one vote." As no word from her came still we waited and prayed.

Wednesday evening came the telegram, "The temperance education bill has passed the New York assembly." In the morning another, "Only two adverse votes." We could hardly believe it. How came this marvelous change we know not. But we do know, as Mrs. Hunt writes, God has given us the victory. And in thinking of all the struggle we are reminded of the words of an unknown writer, "One with God is a majority." Even in New York the legislators obey the people's will. L. S. T.

BRAVE WOMEN OF DAKOTA

Dear Union Signal:—Have you heard of the glorious victory again won for temperance in Kingsbury county? Just as was the case a year and a half ago, the liquor element suddenly sprung a vote on the license question when nobody was expecting such a thing. Now, as then, very little time was given the temperance people to prepare for the issue, with this present disadvantage.

The beginning of March is a snowy, stormy time in Dakota, if there ever is one, and this year deep snows and heavy storms were worse than usual, so that the enemy must have chuckled as he prepared an election, thinking that this time the temperance people could not get anybody out to meetings, and the opposition would have it all their own way.

The stalwart temperance workers however were not idle. They sent for outside help,—among others Capt. Van Etten gave six lectures in the county to crowded houses, and the male votes gave 144 majority against license when the crucial day came.

But as valiant as were the brethren, I doubt if they could have carried the day without the sisters. The county president W. C. T. U. issued a call to every woman to go to the polls, and there in a box prepared expressly for the purpose, cast her vote against license. Of course her vote didn't count anything, and yet it did count a great deal. There were 266 of these little orange colored square women's votes cast into those women's boxes, at the polls in Kingsbury county that day, and every one against license.

Here is one woman's story of how they did their work in one place, that stormy March day:

We, the local union, held two previous extra meetings, at which we appointed committees in different parts of the precinct to call upon every woman, and explain the issue and urge her to come. We also ordered a free lunch to be prepared and served to the voters election day, and as we remembered the injunction, "If thine enemy hunger," etc., it was made free to all, friends and foes alike.

The election was held in the lower room of the schoolhouse, the men taking the north, the women the south side. Our committee had a long counter covered with white table cloths, on which were spread such refreshments as you remember Lake Preston women know so well how to prepare, both as to quality and quantity. Suspended from the ceiling just over the counter was the word "welcome" in large evergreen letters, while beneath and attached to it, was a draping of cretonne on which were our initials W. C. T. U. In the southwest corner hung the old flag between the mottoes, "Vote to save our boys" and "God and home and native land." Appropriate Bible texts were written on many of the black-boards.

Mrs. S. and I were first on the ground. It was with a sinking, palpitating heart I opened the door through which to enter upon that arena of wild and ferocious animals, as much of the talk in these days of franchise agitation would lead one to expect it to be. But few of the roaring element were there. We put the counter between them and ourselves and felt our courage rise, especially as we immediately set about the housewifely duty of "setting table." We had our tickets, as well as "no license" tickets for the men, ready for use as there was opportunity. The day was stormy and cold, and the crowd grew slowly, but at noon, when lunch was announced, we had our hands full, and, from that on till three o'clock we did what we could to give healthy stimulant to the inner man. Perhaps there was no man in the room more conspicuous than the little would-be saloonist, and none regaled themselves more heartily at our counter. Most of our women came out in the afternoon. One had ridden seven miles to give her vote against license (and yet our women would not vote if they could, you know!) An aged mother of foreign birth and able to speak little or nothing in English, came chaperoning a troop of young women. A mother, carrying her tiny babe was there; but the delegation of girls too young to vote, scattered through the town as improvised nurses, made such instances rare. Our judges, Mesdames K. O. and S., with the clerks, were faithful and efficient, and when the hour for closing came, sixty-one names graced our roll—well worth the cheers that had been called out through the day.

On the men's side, the count stood 47 for to 84 against license; and so closed our first election day. A staid Presbyterian sociable could not have been more orderly, and as for pleasant sociability, this rather took the lead. Henceforth—(listen to this conservative Presbyterian sister) I am a convert to woman suffrage.

With this second defeat, it is far more probable now than before that the liquor interest in Kingsbury county so signally put down, will stay down. In the brave little village from which the foregoing account was penned, a saloon has been trying all winter to establish itself. Constant fighting by moral means had kept it so far in statu quo, that its billiard table had been for sometime awaiting a settled home. The day after election the billiard table was quietly shipped to parts unknown.

So by the help of God, another grand victory has been scored in this fair Dakota land. Eternal vigilance, here, as everywhere, is the price of liberty.

BLOSSOMS AND TEMPERANCE.

Dear Union Signal:—A large delegation of Ohio lumbermen were recently tendered an excursion over the G. R. and I. R. R. into northern Michigan, and received hospitalities from lumber manufacturers in several of our cities. We urge a few items from reports of these festivities and courtesies upon your readers. It is a conspicuous demonstration of the axiom "Tastes differ." The reporter from Cadillac says: "One of the features of the banquet was the absence of wines and liquors, and one of the gratifying events was the thanks offered by the president of the association, to several friends for the absence of anything of the kind." What sane, clear-headed person would not heartily congratulate the company that the beautiful floral decoration described below took the place of the tipplers' and guzzlers' outfit of bottles, decanters and glasses? Bottles, decanters and glasses may be very handsome, but a glimpse of the "devils" they are made to hold would be not the most assuring thing in the world at a fraternal feast. We are thankful that these lumbermen found (and that they appreciated it) in Michigan one noble exception to the rule usually followed, and saw it demonstrated that genuine royal hospitality can hand back to the low plane to which it belongs the flashy list of liquors and invest its money in that in which good sense and good taste may both delight. Reports of the lumbermen's visit in Big Rapids say "Champagne flowed as freely and without price, as water."

Knowing the consequences which champagne drinking surely includes, are we not fully justified in saying that this manner of expressing good will is not only in extremely poor taste, but is low and degrading in its whole tendency?

We confess to a delightful sense of relief and pleasure as we turn to the description of the novel floral decoration in which the sensible lumberman of Cadillac indulged.

Aside from the eatables under which the tables groaned there appeared upon them the most superb floral display which it has ever been our pleasure to witness. On the center table appeared a complete floral saw mill in size five feet by three and one-half and two feet high.

The ground on which the mill stands is represented by smilax vines closely woven, while a miniature lake represented by a small mirror, was nestled down between the green banks around it. The mill contained 3,000 carnations, 1,500 violets, besides a countless profusion of primroses, daisies, camelias and other flowers which made up the construction of the mill. The sides and roof of the mill are composed of white carnations, the cornice of white camelias, and each corner is decked with a calla, representing a water spout. On the ridge stands the conventional water barrels made of violets, primroses and carnations, while on the side of the mill, from the boiler room rises a smoke stack composed wholly of violets. The window sashes are represented by red carnations, and the window panes by clear white.

From the lake a slide reaches to the mill, a violet log resting there as if being just drawn into the mill, while on the other end is the tramway with two loaded cars made of primroses and laurestinas. The wheels are of violets and the track of primroses.

A description of this kind does the beautiful piece but little justice and it needs to be seen to be fully appreciated. Really too much praise cannot be bestowed upon the piece as it is a perfect marvel of beauty. Each of the other tables had a center piece composed of hyacinths, daisies, primroses, etc., while out of the center of each rose a miniature tree, among the branches of one of which a pair of squirrels sported, and upon the other were perched a pair of blue jays. Both pieces were beautiful and tasteful. B. W. M.

"THE BLOOD OF THE MARTYR'S IS THE SEED OF THE CHURCH."

Dear Union Signal:—A letter just received from Stoystown, Somerset county, Penn., gives the following: "At a recent celebration of the first anniversary of the W. C. T. U. of that place, just after an address made by Mrs. Baumgardener, president, some scamp threw a bunch of fire crackers into the church door.

These, of course, exploded. Everyone was startled and the children screamed with fright. No one was hurt however, and this explosion of fire works from the enemy inspired the already brave workers with more courage intensifying their zeal tenfold." Now, hear the result: "Twelve new members joined the union at the close of the meeting and all felt like singing, 'Praise God from whom all blessings flow.'"

But that is not all. Now they want me to lose no time in sending them circulars, constitution and by-laws, etc., to start a Y. W. C. T. U. in Stoystown!

You remember, dear Union Signal, Mrs. Youman's exclamation, "Oh for a Queen of Madagascar in the White House!" Well, as I wait and wait for responses to my circulars concerning Y. W. C. T. Unions, in view of the close connection between the Stoystown fire crackers and the Stoystown Y. W. C. T. U. is it very naughty to feel "just a wee bit" like exclaiming, Oh for many explosions of (at least moral) fire crackers in our beloved Keystone state. Yours, waiting and praying,

Mrs. Wm. Patten, Supt. Y. W. C. T. U. Work, Pa.

THE NEEDS OF RURAL NEIGHBORHOODS.

Dear Union Signal:—Ever since I read M. I. W's. article in your issue of Jan. 17, entitled "The Rural Districts" again, I have felt like speaking. "The forward march into the country retreats" must be made before the millennium of temperance dawns; but there are hundreds of families in these retreats, who regard a dollar as almost akin to a fortune, and who would be deterred by the present membership fee of fifty cents per annum.

Yet these poor men drink whisky and vote, and their wives dip snuff and smoke, and how to reach and elevate these people for whom Christ died, is a problem some of us are trying to solve.

The nation's good demands that they be vivified and set to work, but a five cent quarterage would seem burdensome to many of them.

These facts need to be taken into consideration before deciding to raise the membership fees.

With the love of an old crusader, I am, for the good cause, Yours most faithfully,

Mrs. L. Maude Dodge.

Berea, Ky., Feb. 26, 1884.

I would be quiet, Lord, nor tease, nor fret;
Not one small need of mine wilt Thou forget.

I am not wise to know what most I need;
I dare not cry too loud, less Thou shouldst heed.

And in reply should say, "Child, have thy will;
As thou hast chosen, so thy cup I fill!"

This be my only, my supreme request;
Then as to all I need, I shall in Thee be blest!

Nothing is more expensive than penuriousness; nothing more anxious than carelessness; and every duty which is bidden to wait returns with seven fresh duties at its back.—Charles Kingsley.

A BRACE OF TEMPERANCE RECITATIONS.

TEDDY McGUIRE TO PADDY O'FLYNN.

Och, Paddy O'Flynn,
Are yez at it agin—
Drink-drinking away wid the lame and the lazy?
Sure it 's small wit yez had,
At yer soberest, lad.
So what can it be when yer head has gone crazy
Wid whisky and gin?
Foolish Paddy O'Flynn.

Och, Paddy O'Flynn,
See the pickle yer in!
Bare elbows and toes, dhirt and raggedness, Paddy.
Saint Patrick would shame
To be spakin' yer name;
Wouldn't own yez a son of ould Ireland, my laddy;
But the devils would grin
To see Paddy O'Flynn!

Och, Paddy O'Flynn,
While yer spendin' for gin,
Or whisky, gossoon, what per na'in' for dinner.
Yer mither half dead
For praties and bread,
Sits cryin' her eyes out—ye graceless young sinner—
Not worth a bent pin,
Drunken Paddy O'Flynn!

Och, Paddy O'Flynn,
Sich a wurrld as we're in,
Topsy-turvey wid sorrow, how can yez be makin'
More trouble and care,
More grafe and despair;
More wapin' and wailin' and bitter heart-breakin',
More vileness and sin,
Wicked Paddy O'Flynn.

Och, Paddy O'Flynn!
Aich tumbler of gin
Is an ocean too deep for a sowl—it betrays ye;
Whin once yez go down
Ye're certain to drown
If yez float the say-sarpent is likely to saze ye;
And where are yez thin,
Wretched Paddy O'Flynn?

Och, Paddy O'Flynn!
Shtand up and begin
To look like a crature half-dacent and human!
Faith, I'll give yez me hand
Wid a bit of me land,
And I'll lind yez a shpade, and I'll kape the ould woman,
Till yer crops ye get in,
Neighbor Paddy O'Flynn.

Och, Paddy O'Flynn!
There's a heaven to win.
Hooray! smash the glass, shpill the shtuff, so defilin'!
How the divils will howl
Whin they see yer poor sowl
Makin' tracks up the sky wid the angels all smilin',
To welcome yez in,
Happy Paddy O'Flinn!

PADDY O'FLYNN TO TEDDY McGUIRE.

Och, Teddy McGuire!
Me heart's bat'in' higher
To be gratin' yez here on American sile.
'Tis tin years, bedad,
Since I saw yez, me lad,
On that sorrowful day whin I left the Grane Isle;
A friend ye had been
To poor Paddy O'Flynn;
Ye had loved him and lifted him out of the mire,
And me mither died blessin' yez Teddy McGuire.

Och, Teddy McGuire,
I can spake like the squire;
But the ould tongue is best, when I mate an ould friend;
Here's a watch in me vest,
Like a birrd in its nest—
I've praties in plenty and money to spend.
Come home wid me, thin,
And see Mistress O'Flinn,
And she'll trate yez to somethin' ye're sure to desire;
It's a bountiful counthry, dear Teddy McGuire.

Och, Teddy McGuire,
No nade to inquire
If I've been at the whisky jug. Here is my hand,
As dacent and clane
As the hand of a quane,
And strong at the grip; not a man in the land
Could brag of more muscle,
Or bate in a tussle
Wid Paddy O'Flynn; and, troth, ye'll admire
The good clothes I'm wearin' now, Teddy McGuire!

Och, Teddy McGuire!
If ye sthay in the fire
There 's no help at all but ye're sure to be roastin';
Lord love yez to-day
That yez dragged me away,
And chated the divil in spite of his boastin';
Let him rage it he plaze!
I'll not barter me aise,
Nor burn up my soul for the thavish ould liar;
I've done wid the whisky-shops, Teddy McGuire.

Look, Teddy McGuire!
There's a church wid a shpire,
And beyant, a white house wid a terrace below;
Bay windows complate—
Now, isn't it nate,
Wid roses all round it beginnin' to blow?
Wid a lawn in the sun
Where the childer can run,
An orchard behind it, a barn and a byre;
And that is me residence, Teddy McGuire!

Och, Teddy McGuire,
Make haste and come nigher;
There's me wife in the portico watchin' for me.
A swate Yankee girl,
Wid a heart like a pearl,
And a will of her own, as ye're likely to see.
Her father was mad
Whin I courted her, lad;
He'd give her no money, he swore in his ire,
But she loved me and married me, Teddy McGuire.

Thin, Teddy McGuire,
I was workin' for hire,
Wid a beautiful farm and a dairy to tend;
But the ould man relinted
Add lift us, continted,
A snug little fortune to kape us, me friend.
See the childer come out
Wid a rush and a shout—
The swate little cratures!—to welcome their sire
Wid laughter and kisses, dear Teddy McGuire.

Och, Teddy McGuire,
Me blood is on fire,
Me heart it is batin' like waves of the say;
So great is me bliss
To be spakin' like this,
And bringin' yez home to me darlin's this day,
Sure I think whin yez die,
All the angels will cry:
"Here's the man that saved Paddy O'Flynn mountin' higher!
Make room for the swate soul of Teddy McGuire."

THE CHILDREN'S CREED.

BY REV. ALBERT BRYANT.

We believe in our Father in heaven,
Who made the sky, earth, and the sea;
Who heareth the cry of the raven,
And careth for you and for me.

We believe in His Son, the Lord Jesus,
Who loved us when wandering afar;
Who died on the cross to redeem us,
The Babe of the manger and star.

We believe in His Spirit, the holy,
Who giveth our prayers every one;
Who dwelleth in hearts that are lowly—
One God with the Father and Son.

CAPTAIN DEBORAH'S TALK.

Dear Children of the Prevention Army:—Here is a nice little letter from the mother of one of our little soldiers. It speaks well for a certain "squad" of the service, doesn't it?

Captain Deborah:—We have got some firm temperance people in our house. From Papa down to Baby Bess, we hate the "stuff" and its effects.

Little four-year old sister to nine year-old brother: "Louis, don't you never, never stop in front of a drunk store and go in and take a drunk, will you?"

The little boy turned to me and said: "Mother, that day we were waiting for a horse car in Boston, you stood right in front of a saloon, and I tried in vain to get you to move along, but you did not understand me."

This same little boy delighted my heart by voluntarily putting himself on probation, before signing the pledge, at seven years of age. He came home from the temperance meeting, saying that all the children had signed the pledge, but he had not because he wished first to try whether he could deny himself mince pies, of which he is very fond.

Need I say to mothers that I reserved, unknown to him, a generous jar full of the pie meat, for his personal use, before putting in even the boiled cider? And he did triumph. He decided that he could live without mince pie, just as I was having his ciderless pie made.

That is principle; and I thank God that my children have long generations of cool temperance blood back of them.

LOUIS' MOTHER.

In strong contrast to these well taught, well descended little folks, let me tell you of some children I saw one day last week. They did not look, at least many of them did not, as if there were any temperate blood back of them in their fathers, mothers, grandmothers and grandfathers. Some of them had eyes that looked out of half closed lids with such a very faint gleam of intelligence in them, that I wondered how the dear young lady who was teaching them could have any hope in her work. She told me how ignorant they were of all the good things that God has told us in His word, and I am sure no heathen in China could know less. For instance in one of their songs came the words "Marching to the better land." She thought she would see if they knew anything of this better land, and asked them where it was. One little girl said she guessed, "it was the theatre," but another older child with a very wise look in her eyes said "No, it must be the graveyard."

O, little soldiers, make haste and grow up, and rid our dear land of the saloon which curses these poor little people even from their birth.

Captain Deborah.

SIGN YOURSELF.

A WORD TO WIVES.

Your weddin' day to-morrow, lass? Come close here by my side,
And hear the story o' my life, mayhap 'twill be a guide,
To keep your home from shipwreck.

It wur forty year last May
Since John an' I wur married. Thirty year ago today
He died. The first seven year we wur as happy as could be Wi' Will and little Bessie, arter that I seem to see
A sort o' change in John, and then, at last, one dreadful day
He came home—drunk. Next mornin', when the drink had passed away,
I begged and prayed him, as he loved hisself, his barins and me,
To sign the pledge and never drink agen. "But wife," sez he,
"Why should I sign the pledge? If other folk keep straight wi'out, Why so can I." Awhile he went on right, and then broke out
As bad agen. He lived like that, steady a month or so,
Then drunk for days; but when I tried to make him sign, "No, no,
Just half a pint can't hurt," he'd say, and saunter out o' door,
Because he knowed I'd answer that one half-pint led to more,
And that wur truth he wouldn't own. The Parson said one day,
"Why do not you sign, Mrs. Brown?" "I would, sir, right away,"
I said, "if John would too, and so I've told him." "But John might,"
He said, "If you signed first." "Twould do no good," said I.

One night,
Nigh ten months arter, neighbour Jones rushed in. "Oh Mrs. Brown,
Your husband's killed; run over by a cart as knocked him down
Just as he left the 'Duke of York!'" I turned so cold an' queer
I couldn't scarcely stand; but soon they brought him in, poor dear,
Not killed but very badly hurt. 'Twur all that dreadful drink,
It never could have happened else. Three days it wur, I think,
He lay unconscious; Parson came to see him on the third.
We stood beside his bed and talked. "He'll never hear a word.
Poor John! to think he'd ever come to this," I sobbing cried.
"Why didn't he sign the pledge; I'm sure in every way I tried To get him to." But then John's voice just whispered from the bed,
"Ah, wife, you never signed yourself." Though now he's long been dead
I can't a bear to think o' that.

Dear lass, remember me,
And git your man to sign the pledge; sign it yourself. You see
The men don't like us women-folk to seem more strong than they,
"If wife don't need to sign the pledge, what need for I," they say.

Come kiss me lassie. Cryin', dear? You must not cry to-night;
What will Jim say when he comes in? There, smile agen, that's right;
But, lass, remember this, to make your home a happy place,
Don't ever have the drink inside, an' daily seek God's grace.

THE BROKEN PROMISE.

BY MAUDE L. GREEN.

My son if sinners entice thee consent thou not.—Prov. 1: 10.

"Time enough for that, Burt, come on. Just take a little wine for your stomach's sake. You cannot deny that I am right now, for that's according to Scripture," and Carl Gilbert took his companion's arm and drew him away from the door of the little church before which he had paused as if to enter.

"What do you want of a 'pledge,' are you not man enough to leave liquor alone when you wish to? Come!"

"No, Carl, I'm not. I'm ashamed to say it, too, but if I go where liquor is I have to drink it, and its ruining me, beside breaking the heart of my dear, sick mother. And I promised her faithfully that I would sign the pledge tonight and never enter the club room again." There was the earnestness of despair in the tones of the young man as he answered.

"Oh well, if you've made a promise of course you'll have to keep it, but I wouldn't be sneaky about it if I were you," answered the wily Carl, who knew too well the weakness of his friend.

"Sneaky! What do you mean, Carl Gilbert?" demanded Burt, the color surging into his face.

"Mean? Oh, nothing much, only, if I had joined a society and then wanted to leave it, I would go to the members and tell them like a man, that's all. I wouldn't run away."

"But, Carl, I don't wish to go there again. I cannot trust myself, you know I cannot," he answered bitterly.

"There, there, Burt, never mind," Carl replied, and his tones were smooth and sympathetic, although there was a malicious sparkle in his eyes. "Come in and tell the boys about it. I'll stand by you, and you needn't drink if you don't wish to. You know I introduced you there, and I wouldn't want you to go off in this way."

"But my promise, Carl," protested Burt.

"Why, you needn't stay here ten minutes, just long enough to acquit yourself like an honorable fellow you know, then stop at the temperance meeting on your way home. Never you fear but there will be red ribbon enough left for half a dozen fellows like you."

They had reached the club room now and were standing where the light, shining through the beautifully stained windows, bathed them in its rosy warmth and fell about them in many soft shades of color upon the pavement. How cosy it was! Carl opened the door and drew his now unresisting companion in.

They were not related, these two; neither did they occupy the same social position, yet they had become friends, and in this way:

Carl Gilbert, the elder by some three years, was the son of a wealthy banker, and in this bank Burt Youngs, the only dependence of an invalid and widowed mother, held the position of book keeper.

Carl was absent at college when Burt had secured this place and all had gone well. It had been a happy day day in the little cottage in Pearl street when Burt returned with the news of his appointment, and many were the comforts that had been added to the life of the invalid mother since then. But a shadow was coming.

Carl Gilbert was a good specimen of a spoiled child. Wilful, cunning and dissolute, and on his return he immediately took it upon himself to give that "pale-faced youngster," as he took pleasure in naming Burt, "a taste of the world," and Burt, not a little flattered by the young man's attention, proved an easy prey.

The process had been slow. First it was "a ride" with Carl after his "pet trotter." Next a peep at the boys in the club room of "Our Jolly Young Fellows," a few minutes' chat and look at the evening paper. "No harm in that, surely?" Again, "one of the new cigarettes, not a bit strong," a "sip of catawba, perfectly sweet, my boy, wouldn't hurt a baby." All this and much more until poor unsuspecting Burt had so far lost himself in the treacherous net, that he made no resistance and every night found him with his companions.

With this came the petty fictions in giving excuses for evenings spent away from home, until the wan face and blood-shot eyes told their own story.

Then it was that his almost heart-broken mother entreated him, as only a tender mother can, and tonight he had promised.

A few hours later the two came out upon the street, Carl walking erect while Burt leaned heavily upon his arm and stepped in a dazed uncertain way.

"Seems to me, Burt, it takes precious little to make you top-heavy," was Carl's heartless remark. "I drank three times what you did, and I'm all right. You're fresh though; s'pose that's the reason, didn't begin imbibing at your father's side-board when you were knee-high to nothing—but look a' here, sonny," he continued as Burt pitched heavily forward, "straighten up, or you'll disgrace that red ribbon you were going after. Now, go easy while I take you home to your mother."

"Lemme lone, I'm not goin' home," stammered Burt, making an effort to free himself, "I never'll go home till—"

"Until your sober, do you mean? Then come down to the water and cool off," interrupted Carl.

They made their way to the dock and entering a small row boat pushed off into the lake.

"Better be careful, young men," called the old boatman as he drew up the chain that had fastened the skiff, "takes a clear head to weather a sea like this."

"Never mind us, Uncle, we need a little rough work before we go home tonight."

There is little more to tell. My story is a short one and full of sadness.

Out from the shore the waves were rough, and even the boasted strength of Carl gave way. The moon shone serenely above them, but clouds were scudding across the sky, and the wind was rising.

In the morning the old boatman found them lying on the white sands of the beach, whither the washing of the waves had brought them—drowned.

The mansion was draped, the cottage closed, for in a darkened room of each lay the hope and pride of the parent's heart.

A week later, and from the cottage door another funeral train has passed, and the broken-hearted mother is laid beside her misguided boy in the village churchyard; while the grandeur of the palatial home cannot shut out the shadow that has fallen across its threshold. But from the club room the light still shines through the stained windows and bathes other young men in its rosy warmth as it falls about them in soft and glowing colors upon the pavement.

Fathers, mothers, where are your boys tonight?

In a recent sermon Henry Ward Beecher said: "I feel sore at heart now. One of the noblest natures that used to sit in these seats, one I loved and who loved me; whose hand was as large in its generosity as a prairie; who had all the prospects of a noble and useful life, who could 'restrain himself and stop when he'd a mind to.' But he has gone down to such a degree of intemperance that his friends have given him up in despair. How many of that kind have I seen; and the time past did not suffice for him, or for them. They say: 'To be sure I smoke; but only a few cigars a day; but it is not a necessity for me—I can give it up.' Or, 'I know I drink a little; but it is not a necessity for me; I can give it up today.' But they don't; and they don't next year, or the year after; and when they hear the roar of the tide of perdition, over which they will plunge finally, they can't."

TOPIC: PAUL'S THIRD MISSIONARY JOURNEY.

Lesson Text.—Acts 18: 23–28; 19: 1–7.

Golden Text.—"And when Paul had laid his hands upon them, the Holy Ghost came on them." Acts 19:6.

Time.—A. D. 54.

Place.—Ephesus, in Asia Minor.

1. One of the best works of Priscilla and Aquila, was the perception and confirmation of Apollos' possibilities and ministry. A Jew, faintly apprehending Christ, well versed in the scriptures, eloquent in speech, he was to be a power in the early church, and to these wise disciples belongs the credit of foreseeing his usefulness and at the same time perfecting him in the knowledge of Messiah and His kingdom in the earth. Priscilla, to whom great prominence is given by Luke in this and other instances was evidently a woman of more than ordinary culture, of rare insight amounting almost to prophetic gift, and a diligent student of the scriptures as well as of the later Christian teachings. God's providence in allowing these faithful disciples to be expelled from Rome, that in Corinth they might learn of Christ from Paul, and thence go with him to Ephesus to bring in as a Gospel yokefellow the silver-tongued Apollos, the recognized partner of Paul, seems very plain to us who view it in the long perspective of the centuries. Just as surely is God's hand to be looked for in every event of a consecrated life.

2. A blessed possibility opens to every humble worker in a good cause. He may not be gifted to argue brilliantly, to plead eloquently or even to labor as earnestly as some, but he may be gifted with a prophetic instinct direct from God, pointing out to him the available qualities in those around them, enabling him to bring to light and anoint for service the hidden apostle whose tongue may reach thousands before inaccessible. Let us keep our hearts open to the heavenly suggestions, and our eyes fixed on the harvest field.

3. Paul returning to Ephesus must have found a dearth of spiritual gifts, a cold church, a want of happy, joyous Christian life. Instantly he divines the reason. "Have ye received the Holy Ghost since ye believed" means "Ye are wanting the gift of the Comforter." How many societies and churches bear the same token of a great lack! And in every case the prescription would be the same—Christ's presence—His promised spirit is not with you. Seek that, and love, joy, peace, and all the precious gifts of heaven come down to earth are yours.

4. The gift of the Holy Spirit confers even more than the enjoyment of peace and happiness—it gives tongues, power of expression. Some good Christians there are who have never apprehended this, who possessing a large share of the gifts of the Spirit enumerated in Galatians 5: 22, 23, yet fail to realize that the spirit gives the power of utterance. They cannot make up their minds to be heard in a prayer service, to conduct the opening exercises of the W. C. T. U. meeting, or to give personal testimony to the exceeding goodness of God. There is emphatically "more beyond" in such a Christian experience, sweet and lovely as it may be. The gospel would never have made great progress in early ages but for the gift of tongues. The world needs it today. Why not have it?

A GOOD WEEK FOR ANNIVERSARIES.

Last week was a good one for fine annual meetings. The W. C. T. U. of Cleveland ushered in the anniversary exercises on Sunday, March 16, with a program of large interest. A previous meeting on Saturday gave a history of the Crusade, by Mrs. Howard Ingham, and a history of the second amendment campaign, by Miss Jennie Duty. But Sunday, "the great day of the feast," was given to both crusade and union anniversaries, the former occurring in the morning at the Third Presbyterian church, of Cleveland, and the latter at the Second church of the same denomination, and devoted to an address by the National president, Miss Willard. The Cleveland Herald report says:

Her address last evening was in its entirety characteristic of herself—full of forcible logic and reason. The meeting was called to order at 7:30 o'clock, Mrs. President Prather, Rev. Dr. Wolcott, Rev. Dr. Pomeroy, Rev. G. O. King, pastor of the Wilson Avenue Presbyterian church, occupying seats in the pulpit. After the beautiful anthem by the choir, Scripture reading by Rev. Mr. Davis and prayer by Rev. Mr. King, Dr. Pomeroy stepped forward and in a few well chosen remarks introduced Miss Willard. In her clear, penetrating voice, which she carried through to the end, she delivered her address.

On Monday the annual business meeting was held and the election of officers, resulting in the following roster:

President, Mrs. J. S. Prather; acting vice presidents, Miss F. Jennie Duty, Miss M. E. Ingersoll, Mrs. William T. Smith, Mrs. J. F. C. Hays; honorary vice presidents, Mrs. H. C. Ford, Mrs. Stillman Witt, Mrs. Amasa Stone, Mrs. J. D. Rockefeller, Miss Sarah Fitch; recording secretary, Mrs. Mary E. Morgan; corresponding secretary, Miss F. Jennie Duty; assistant corresponding secretary, Mrs. C. B. Hanna; treasurer, Miss Anna L. Hubbell; auditor, Mr. H S. Raymond, and an executive board of thirty-one ladies, among whom we notice the familiar names of Miss Anna Edwards, Mrs. Howard Ingham and Mrs. E. J. Phinney.

The trustees are Messrs. Joseph Perkins, J. D. Rockefeller, Captain A. Bradley, Colonel W. H. Harris, Gen. Edward S. Meyer.

Advisory committee, Messrs. Joseph Perkins, E. C. Pope, W. H. Doan, D. P. Eells, J. D. Rockefeller, J. B. Meriam, Reuben T. Smith.

On Monday evening the palatial home of Mr. Jos. Perkins was opened for a reception to Miss Willard and the Cleveland W. C. T. U. Again we borrow from the Herald its description of this delightful episode:

From four o'clock until nine the rooms of the house were thronged with invited guests, all assembled there to do honor to a noble woman and to partake of the elegant hospitalities of a generous host and hostess. Over one thousand invitations had been sent out, and every effort possible was made to render the reception a success. Weisgerber prepared the bounteous repast, while the sweet music of the Germania Orchestra echoed throughout the halls of the house. Beautiful and sweet were the flowers scattered profusely throughout the rooms that filled all parts of the residence with their fragrance. The reception was, indeed, a fitting and appropriate termination of the great anniversary of a mighty benevolent organization, having for its motto, "Happy homes and temperance for the masses."

The Central W. C. T. U. of Chicago, not one whit behind her Ohio compeer, brought on its anniversary program just following the Cleveland celebration. "Ten wonderful years" indeed are they which have just ended, and the Central Union has every reason to be glad and grateful for the record of their useful service. Hershey Hall, one of the prettiest small halls of the city was decorated and adorned for the occasion. The broad platform was furnished like a drawing room. Easy chairs, folding screens, etageres, graceful tables crowned with living plants, mirrors, easels with pictures, costly draperies, and all the accessories of a beautiful salon were disposed artistically upon the stage and the participants in the exercises "sat about" with the air of hostesses receiving guests, rather than as speakers on a public platform.

The morning was devoted to official reports—that of the treasurer giving the receipts for the year as $5,727.61; expenditures, $5,691.80. The report of the corresponding secretary, Miss Helen L. Hood, showed that $3,000 of this sum had been devoted to the Bethesda Mission, a gospel temperance and medical missionary institution in the heart of the Black Hole of Chicago, where a free kindergarten, a Band of Hope, industrial school, children's church and Sabbath school, are operated in connection with the free dispensary and nightly gospel temperance work.

This report also revealed the fact that this union is about to move in the direction of a $350,000 building to be located in the business centre of the city, the rentals of which will in twenty years pay off the bonds with annual interest, taxes and improvements. Mrs. T. B. Carse is the honored leader in this grand forward movement. To her it has been given to found on business principles the stock company now publishing the national organ, and no one who knows her faith and works, and her entire dependence on the Power that works for us, can doubt concerning the final success of this new building.

A new constitution and by-laws made necessary by the incorporation of the society for the legal protection of its property, were adopted and the officers elected for the new year, as follows: President, Mrs. T. B. Carse; first vice-president, Mrs. J. B. Hobbs; second vice-president, Mrs. Nathaniel Norton; third vice-president, Mrs. H. W. Plummer; recording secretary, Mrs. M. L. Howell; corresponding secretary, Miss Helen L. Hood; treasurer, Mrs. C. E. Bigelow; a board of thirty lady managers having been elected at a meeting previous to incorporating. The trustees are Messrs. William Deering, J. B. Hobbs, R. T. Crane, Matthew Laflin, C. H. Case. A Bible reading of an hour conducted by Mrs. Stroud Smith of Liverpool, opened the afternoon session which was devoted to reports from the police station work by Mrs. J. B. Hobbs, from Bethesda Mission, by the editor of THE UNION SIGNAL, and an eloquent address on "The thought of the hour" by Miss Lucia Kimball.

The police station work showed that 151 girls under twenty years of age had been under the care of one police matron alone, during the year; that destitute women to the number of 103 had been aided and helped to better lives; in another station 152 young women have been placed under the matron's care.

Miss Kimball plead that a room in the new building be devoted to the young folks and children, since there was no building in the vast city sacred to childhood. She earnestly begged for systematic Sunday school temperance work, and showed clearly how it might be secured. The entire school should be organized into a cold water army, and each child have a card showing that he belonged to it. The church of God ought to lead in the temperance work, but the Sunday school was the most powerful agent. A lady should be appointed temperance secretary in each Sunday school.

Several numbers of beautiful music were interspersed in the program and the effect of the entire day's work was excellent, a large audience remaining through the whole.

The evening entertainment was however the crowning glory. A fine orchestra relieved the waiting interval at the beginning and gave several fine selections. Mrs. J. B. Hobbs occupied the chair, Mrs. L. A. Hagans read the crusade psalm, and the Rev. Mr. Fawcett offered prayer. The National president was then introduced and gave a clear exposition and history of the "Ten wonderful years" of the Chicago Woman's Christian Temperance Union. "The city of contrasts," she called it, this great western city, with 4,000 saloons on one hand, three hundred churches on the other; Mrs. T. B. Carse a mighty leader of temperance work, and Harry Rubens, a wily leader of the L. L. D's. (Liquor Dealer's League); Bethesda, the pool of healing, and the Black Hole. She said,

Great opportunities came along so fast they could hardly use them. God was in this organization preparing the plants that were going to be set out in the garden of government before the youngest there was gray. The women who learned parliamentary usage in Farwell Hall are the ones that later on will be able to take the reins of a bigger meeting than that of the W. C. T. U. This would not be by revolution, but by evolution—by growth. She was talking the human question tonight. Where women were not the deterioration of men was easily seen. If women were patient, gentle, and true this would come in God's good time—not theirs. They were always pitching their tents one day's journey nearer the end. Miss Willard referred in touching terms to those of their band who had gone on before. Before the next decade there would be snowy hair upon many heads now present. She begged forgiveness for mistakes, so easily made. The curse of the liquor traffic should not go forth from America without a fight. The saloonkeeper said he must recruit his patrons from some mother's fireside or cradle. He would change his face until his mother wouldn't know it, and change his soul until God wouldn't know it. If there was ever any dress parade in the temperance cause it is past. "Sin worketh: let me work too. Death undoeth: let me undo."

A liberal collection was taken up in response to Mrs. Carse's earnest appeal for the "sinews of war." And so ended the second of these notable anniversaries.

What hath God wrought?

IT is with great regret that we chronicle the continued illness of Mrs. Mary G. C. Leavitt, in California. Her brave labors are therefore at a temporary stand still, but all hearts pray

"God love her
Aye, and in good sooth
We may be sure He doth."

MISS WILLARD requests that the following corrections be made in the "official statement" of the supplement:

The statement is made that the recording secretary in her capacity of president of Ohio W. C. T. U. sent "for plans." The reading should be "sent forth plans." In "Document II." for "vivid" read "varied."

The Canada temperance women appreciate Col. Bain. One gifted singer, Mrs. M. H. Wright—sends this bit of verse after him:

Work on! Kentucky Brother,
For Canada's fair fame,
And every wife and mother
Shall bless thy honor'd name.

If broad and noble waters
Roll twixt your land and ours,
Though broader were those waters
We'll bring Immortelle flowers—

The laurel, and the queenly rose,
To strew where thou shalt tread,
Like perfume of thy noble acts,
When thou art with the dead.

He never made a more complete capture however than in the university town of Evanston, Illinois last week. The people surrendered unconditionally to his southern challenge, to protect the home against the saloon—and the college students are thinking of placing him with Gough on their next winter's lecture course.

* * * * *

At the close of his lecture Miss Gordon stepped to his side, and in the neatest of little speeches concocted on the spot, presented him a magnificent basket of flowers from Miss Willard, herself "on duty" that night in Chicago.

My good, wise, little friend, Dr. Bessie Cushman, endorses the animadversions on "pie" that have been printed in THE UNION SIGNAL lately.

The woman's suffrage amendment passed the Iowa senate week before last and now waits only the assent of the house of representatives to go to the people. Remember whom you represent, good friends, the women of the home and the church, they who stay by the stuff in times of war and legislative sessions, and who ought to share the spoil equally with those who go to the battle.

* * * * *

In the senate, while this matter was pending, one senator brought forth from his treasures new and old, the not particularly new plea that "woman with the ballot must trail her garments through the slums of the saloon." Whereupon Senator Logan, with faith as sturdy as his corporeal frame or his "consecrated common sense" replied by saying "that after the 4th of July next, both the slums and saloons will be gone."

Our evangelists are making full proof of their ministry this winter. Mrs. Lathrap is at Summerfield M. E. church Milwaukee, conducting a blessed revival service which already yields rich harvest. Mrs. Mary H. Villars of Illinois at Olney, has seen over 114 conversions result from the meetings.

I had a peep this morning at still another "souvenir" about to be packed off to the national museum. It was an ivory and gold pencil case, the property of Mrs. Ruth Riley Cooper, who won it in a prize poem contest at a county fair in Michigan. The poem was written "on the spot" and the muse was kind. A later poem of Mrs. Cooper's is the story of "Real Life" put up in leaflet shape, a tiny bit of ministry, just the thing to put into the hands of some poor struggler with appetite.

THE UNION SIGNAL croweth lustily and who shall deny it the pleasure? over the fact recently reported to me that a town election in New York state (Sodus) was won largely through the instrumentality of its no license ract, "Shall we license the dram shop?" written by Prof. Foster, M. P.

* * * * *

I have great faith in Governor Sherman of Iowa; in his principle, and surely in his gallantry since his happy presentation of the pen with which he signed the prohibitory law, to Mrs. Florence Miller, the W. C. T. U. state editor—than whom, says the governor, no one has been a more faithful or helpful advocate of the new regime.

* * * * *

Col. George Babcock, of California, recently captured the hearts of large assemblies in Washington, D. C. Among other good things said, he arraigned the inconsistency of his compatriots in assailing the great transcontinental railroads, one of which, the Central Pacific, last year employed 12,300 men as laborers, and paid them in coin $7,900,000; the licensed liquor industry of the state, "the whisky ring" employed about an equal number of licensed and unlicensed saloon-keepers, who took from the labor element over $21,000,000 in profits, and nobody complains.

* * * * *

"'Amen,' says your brother for the 'human question'" is the finale of our W. C. T. U. brother-in-law, Edward Morris, fixed to the decision of the court of common pleas, to admit Mrs. Carrie Burnham Kilgore to practice in the courts of Pennsylvania.

* * * * *

I am asked to inquire what people, i. e. UNION SIGNAL people, would think of an index or table of contents inserted on the first page of the "organ, etc." I'm not sure myself that it wouldn't spoil the general effect of that usually clean looking "outward presentment," but then I usually stick to my "Watch Tower" and don't advise.

* * * * *

Miss Lucia Kimball has the "open sesame" of the churches. Union Park and Bethany Congregational have recently had the benefit of her public and Sunday school ministrations; and in her work in organizing the Band of Hope in Chicago, she meets a just and generous welcome everywhere.

* * * * *

Ben. Hogan, the ex-prize fighter, is doing good in Dillon, Montana. During three evenings upwards of one hundred and eighty persons signed the pledge, and among that number were fifty daily drinkers. A Reform Club is to be organized, and already fifty names are down for membership. Mr. Hogan lectures very aptly on "Training," or "How are men put in condition?"

* * * *

A valiant soldier of the south is the Hon. Mr. Wood of the Kentucky legislature. His recent speech on prohibition therein, is sound to the core and brave to the quick.

* * * * *

There are some drops of sorrow in THE UNION SIGNAL cup. One of them fell in at reading the following, (so says the publisher.)

Sing, sing, birds of spring,
Tell of the flowers the summer will bring.

With truest pleasure the address of Prof. George E. Foster on prohibition was read in THE UNION SIGNAL, of January 14. As our union is planning a prohibition campaign for this parish (corresponding to your county), I forthwith betook myself to the office of our Tribune to learn at what price I could obtain three hundred copies for use. "Five dollars," was the answer. I then hied me to the Democrat office, and the question elicited the same reply. "But with the privilege of using it in our pages." To this I acceded, and in due time obtained my copies all ready for distribution. THE UNION SIGNAL, just two weeks later, tells me that the address is dispensed at that office for thirty cents per one hundred!

"Wail, wail, Nightingale!
Sing of a mourner, bowed and pale."

* * * * *

It was not the Y. W. C. T. U. of Yonkers that gave the $50 thankoffering to the "National"—but the mother of this fine daughter—the "old original," W. C. T. U.

* * * * *

Here is a "bid" for closer watching. Of course I ought to have seen that bonfire before this:

Denver, Col., is not too far from the Watch-Tower to interest the watchers. The whole state is firing up for a grand bonfire in honor of Right—this illumination already showing even daily papers that their duty—and advantage—opens their columns for as extended notices of the doings of temperance workers as the latter care to use. A new departure! A rousing citizens' committee, to prepare for municipal prohibition this spring, includes two women—W. C. T. U., of course. Moreover, good men who called us fanatics a year ago, now lead the movement, and strike for as much as we could ask.

* * * * *

The editor says this scrap from Mrs. Washing'on is too good to keep:

Please to say if the enclosed is received and will appear, or is it doomed to the fearful "waste basket," receptacle for many a tale
'Twere better never told;
A world of dross, where one might fail
To find a grain of gold;
And yet the trifles that I write are far too dear to me,
The "devil's" kitchen fire to light,
Or keep him company.

News From the Field.

NEW YORK.

Canandaigua.—Your last number calls for "more news" from New York, and I gladly answer the call. We are rejoicing over the good tidings that the scientific instruction bill has passed both houses of our legislature, and with such decided majorities as to almost ensure its becoming a law of our state so we follow the lead of Michigan, New Hampshire, Vermont, and look to the future for our grand success in the temperance work. We, of western New York, have been pushing this line of work for two years past, have had the assistance of Mrs. Louise Rounds, who has given many telling blows for the cause during the past winter. Her convincing manner and words carry conviction wherever she speaks. I will not ask space to enumerate the different methods we have used, but the culmination came in a lecture from Mrs. Mary D. Hunt, who has worked so faithfully and successfully in the state during the past winter. We had a union service at our largest church Sunday evening, March 2, and it was crowded in every part. The Congregational pastor presided, and the Methodist and Baptist assisted in the devotional exercises. We have never listened to a more convincing argument, or had our attention called to a more practical method than she proposed for its accomplishment. At the conclusion of her address Rev. S. E. Eastman presented the following preamble and resolutions:

Whereas, A bill is now pending before the legislature of this state, entitled, "An act relating to the study of Physiology and Hygiene in the Public Schools," the design of which is that in all schools supported by public money, or under state control, instruction shall be given in those branches, with special reference to the effects of alcoholic drinks, stimulants and narcotics upon the human system, and

Whereas, Such legislation looks to better citizenship, and is therefore within the power and duty of the state: therefore,

Resolved, That we, citizens of Canandaigua and of the state of New York, do hereby recommend its speedy enactment.

Resolved, That a copy of the foregoing resolution be presented to Hon. Frank Rice, our member of assembly, with the respectful request that he will give the said bill his earnest support, and will aid in securing its passage; and that a copy be also presented to his excellency, Grover Cleveland, governor of the state, with the respectful request that he will give the said bill his careful consideration.

After reading them a rising vote was taken, and they were adopted unanimously.

We are sure that the influence of this lecture will make it easier to enforce the law when it comes upon our statute books, and without which our labor will be all in vain.

Mrs. Theodore Perkins, Cor. Sec. W. C. T. U.

Cold Spring.—The people of Cold Spring, Putnam county, have been doing a grand good work during the past winter, and by organing a Law and Order League, have set the temperance ball rolling with such velocity that a large number of liquor saloons have disappeared on account of the increase license fee. The league is composed of some of the best and most earnest Christian men of the place, led and upheld by the pastor, and it is one of the most efficient organization in this region. The women, too, have asked for an organization, and that has been accomplished.

A meeting was held March 14, in the Baptist church, with about thirty ladies present. Fifteen of the number became members, and after adopting a constitution and electing officers they professed themselves ready to enter enthusiastically into the work. It is a live town, and we shall hear more from them after election which will occur in a few days. Officers elected were Mrs. M. L. Palmer, president; Miss Jennie Morrison, secretary.

Mrs. A. M. Stewart,
Organizer for Putnam County.

PENNSYLVANIA.

Honesdale.—The annual meeting of the W. C. T. U. was held in the Presbyterian chapel, Feb. 13, 1884. The report of the secretary containing a summary of the year's work was full of encouragement and strengthened all who heard it in their purpose to work for temperance. The receipts and disbursments for all purposes during the year were $100. The superintendent of juvenile work reported a Band of Hope organized June 8th with 75 members. It was held each week during the summer vacation. The interest in some classes steadily increased. The study of alcohol was entirely new to all. Some expressed themselves as fascinated with the study. The most discourageing feature in the work was the indifference of mothers. Inexcusable and unaccountable as it seems, the fact remains that the mass of mothers do not support zealously temperance instruction. The delusion that our own sons and danghters are safe is very general. The Sunday-school committee reported eleven hundred and fifty temperance lesson leaves published by National Union used in six schools. Committee on scientific instruction report that text books have been placed on the desk of each teacher in the Honesdale graded schools, that the teachers may inform themselves upon the subject, and be prepared for their work where scientific temperance has been embodied in the school laws of Pennsylvania.

Committee on prison work reported religious services held regularly in the jail under the auspices of the W. C. T. U. and reading furnished the prisoners of Honesdale and vicinity three hundred tracts in the schools. Committee of literature reported fifty copies of temperance perodicals taken by the members. Press committee reported that our three county papers have given valuable space for temperance items, also free notices of regular and special meetings.

The committee on literature is busy getting up a club for The Union Signal which we consider indispensable in our work.

The four Protestant churches of our town use unfermented wine at the Lord's Table.

As these reports were given the sweet face of our beloved president, Mrs. Dr. Westwood, (recently removed,) came before us. We remembered that her clear brain and consecrated lips called into existence these committees and by her the machinery of organization was set in motion.

Mrs. W. B. Holmes, Cor. Secy.

VERMONT.

Under the auspices of the W. C. T. U. a series of temperance meetings were held in Burlington during the month of February. Rev. C. C. Frost, of Norwich, Conn., was in our city nine days, holding "gospel temperance meetings" every night save one.

Notwithstanding the inclement weather the city hall was filled with an interested audience. During the meetings one hundred and sixty signed the pledge, the majority being children.

A week later Mrs. McLaughlin came to us for a few days and by her practical suggestions and sound reasoning the temperance sentiment advanced with rapid strides.

A lady of our union, Mrs. Dr. Nichols, kindly gave a reception for Mrs. McLaughlin. A large number of ladies were present and listened with close attention to an informal talk of more than an hour. Bits of experience from her own work, practical suggestions, all told in a delightful way, afforded us a treat not to be soon forgotten. Mrs. McLaughlin gave the ladies an opportunity to ask any questions they desired. Steps were taken that afternoon toward the organization of a Y. W. C. T. U.

Mrs. McLaughlin spoke with much earnestness. She evidently thoroughly believes that "There is something for you and for me to do."

Monday evening the topic discussed was, "Is the temperance cause a failure?" One of our local papers stated the following morning, "Those who did not hear Mrs. McLaughlin last night missed not only a convincing series of arguments against intemperance, but also a rare intellectual treat." She reviewed the temperance work from the earliest period, showing very clearly that advancement had been made, and that we had great reason for encouragement.

Mrs. E. M. Wheeler.

MICHIGAN.

Kalamazoo.—Having never troubled you much by my communications, I feel at liberty to say a few words in relation to the lectures which we have been having here this winter. We first had the inimitable Carswell, who opened the course with two lectures to the satisfaction of all, many saying thay thought he far surpassed Gough. Then followed Major Baird in his lecture "The City of Hell," which laid open to the mind of the public the horrors of the liquor traffic as never before. This lecture will do immense good wherever given. Next came John B. Finch, who by his indictment of, and clear cut argument against the liquor taffic, left no ground on which a man, without compromising his better judgment could stand and vote to license this curse of curses in our midst. Yesterday, March 11th, brought to our city Col. G. W. Bain of Kentucky, whose lecture on "Our Country, our Homes, and our Duty" must be heard to be fully appreciated. A well filled house greeted the speaker, and the oft repeated sounds of applause testified the hearty appreciation of the audience. One of our business men remarked to me referring to a good sized box which I was taking to the express, "If that box were filled with gold as the proceeds of Col. Bain's lecture, it would be as nothing to its weight of influence for good upon the citizens of Kalamazoo." The W. C. T. U. feels much encouraged by the visit of these temperance giants and our benediction shall ever follow them in their labors "For God and home and native land."

M. E. Pengelly, Pres. W. C. T. U.

OHIO.

Richland County.—This county has nine unions, six or seven of them organized within the past year. Mrs. F. A. Gilbert of Mansfield is the county president, and I wish every county had one as energetic and as devoted to the cause. Pursuant to her call a convention has just been held in Shelby.

This Shelby union was organized in July it now has ninety-seven members, and a juvenile union of more than two hundred members.

At our meeting in the morning, after the devotional hour, we listened to reports from the unions which were exceedingly interesting, showing that good work is being done for the cause by those new unions.

A question-box was opened in the afternoon and the replies were given by Mrs. S. M. Perkins of Cleveland. The convention on resolutions [then gave] their report and an animated discussion followed. A resolution favoring the ballot for woman was passed by a large majority.

A vote was taken to have every member pay a certain sum of money to assist the county officers in the prosecution of the work, as the county treasury is entirely without funds.

In the evening a large audience assembled in the Presbyterian church and Mrs. Perkins gave her lecture, "The need of prohibition."

It was a day fraught with interest to the cause, and the Shelby women did everything in their power for the comfort of the delegates. Flowers and plants adorned the church, the music was good, and all the sessions were well attended.

WISCONSIN.

Black River Falls.—We have gained a no license victory. The Lord has been better to us than all our fears. The most sanguine did not expect to win sixty-three majority. We sometimes forget how great the power of God can be in the hearts of men when we are look toward this "abomination that maketh desolate" (the liquor traffic). Hon. W. T. Price came home from Washington to help our cause both by vote and influence. Opera Hall was packed to its fullest capacity at our last temperance mass meeting of the campaign to hear Rev. James McCleary, of Kenosha, president of the Catholic Total Abstinence Union of America. He dealt some telling blows against the traffic especially when alluding to German legislation which restrained by rigid laws strictly enforced, paying no attention to the "personal liberty" of the subject. Our work here lay in the line of convincing our Norwegian and Catholic friends that temperance was the one thing needful. The Rev. Mr. Handkisson spoke in Norwegian to a crowded house of his countrymen. The work of these two gentlemen helped us to win the day perhaps more than all other effort combined.

For the year past our W C. T. U. has held its ground in the face of discouragement and has been the only temperance organization alive to the situation. We commenced gospel temperance meetings last October and have held them every Sabbath afternoon. Though the rougher class has not been drawn in sentiment has been kept alive and crystalized in the minds of the earnest and thoughtful portion. Saturday afternoon, March 1, we held a special meeting in the pleasant parlors of Mrs. D. J. Spaulding, where Mrs. I. H. Irish, our state president, gave us an informal talk on local and state work, recommending the plan laid down by our National President, and urging upon us especially the appointing of committees for Scandinavian and German work, also the holding of a county convention the coming summer which would be productive of good, as thereby a union could be formed in every town in the county, thus broadening and deepening our usefulness in helping on state work which is crippled for lack of means. While she commended our zeal for local prohibition she felt that to make it more effective we must work for state prohibition. This first visit of our state president will be of lasting good to us making us feel more than ever that we are a part and parcel of the great army of workers in our land. At the close of our meeting little tables were placed around the room as if by magic and Mrs. Spaulding, assisted by two of the members of Our Girls' Union, served an elegant lunch in her own inimitable way.

We have organized Our Girls' Union with a membership of twenty-five, representing our best young ladies; have had one parlor meeting; eight young men took our pledge and became honorary members, donning the white ribbon. Then our Little Temperance Workers, I wish you could see them, about forty enrolled. I am so happy in superintending them. I have been pressing the claims of The Union Signal and hope to send in ten names soon.

Mrs. L. M. Kimball.

Early in February the president and corresponding secretary of the state union addressed a letter to each member of the executive board of the Wisconsin Agricultural Society reminding them of the resolution to prohibit the sale of beer upon the fair grounds once adopted by their society at the request of the W. C. T. U. and asking its renewal and continuance. The letter also called attention to the fact that at the last fair the state law forbidding any device for gambling was disregarded.

This letter met with favorable response from the temperance members of the board, and on Tuesday Feb. 5, about a score of ladies of the W. C. T. U. entered the Agricultural rooms at the capitol to hear the discussion of the temperance question. Two of the ladies made brief remarks. Earnest and able speeches in favor of temperance on the fair grounds were made by Messrs. J. W. Ward, of Baraboo and J. M. Smith, of Green Bay. The greater part of the time however was taken up by the advocates of beer, and the discussion was closed with a motion, which was carried, to postpone the decision although the question had been put, voted upon, a division of the house called for and in response to this call several names had been read by the secretary and the votes recorded.

This action of the Agricultural Society has called out indignant comment from all parts of the state. Newspapers at home and abroad criticise or ridicule according to their nearness to and interest in our state affairs.

Mrs. Emma C. Bascom, corresponding secretary of the Madison W. C. T. U., wrote an open letter to the executive board giving an outline of the arguments advanced by the principal speakers in behalf of beer. To this letter replies have been made in strict accordance with the famous principle said to have been given a law class by a distinguished member of the bar: "If you have no case, abuse the opposing attorney."

Since recording our last items for "News from the Field" we learn that the River Falls union celebrated Memorial Day and sent ten dollars to the treasury of the National Union.

The Rosendale union also observed the day and sent three dollars to the German fund. The memorial service of the Dartford union was unavoidably postponed until Feb. 16. After the usual opening exercises, reading of Crusade Psalm, prayer, singing of Crusade hymn, a member of the union read an address, which was followed by brief and excellent remarks by Rev. Mr. Creighton, presiding elder of Waupacca district. The receipts were about eight dollars.

CONNECTICUT.

Birmingham.—From reports given I infer that you do not hear from this state very often, and especially from this place. Our W. C. T. U. was organized some four years ago and they have struggled hard to keep their head above the great tidal wave of intemperance. Now meeting with success and again with discouragements. It was prophesied that the fanatic zeal of a few women would burn out and leave nothing but smoke. But such has not been the case; the work of our union has been slow but sure, we have our semi monthly open meetings from which lately quite an interest in the temperance cause is arising. After one of our late meetings, about ten or twelve of our voters came together and formed a prohibition caucus and sent two delegates to the state convention in Hartford. Six months ago we could not have accomplished such a thing. On March 10th we gave a supper for the benefit of the union from which we netted about thirty dollars. We have a mother's meeting and a Band of Hope numbering about eighty children. They meet every Sunday afternoon and are doing a grand work in educating the children to shun the intoxicating cup and instilling into their young hearts temperance principles that may never be overcome by temptation.

Our late encouragements have given us new zeal and we will go forward and press the work until victory crowns our labors. "God will bless the right."

Recording Secretary.

MASSACHUSETTS.

Taunton.—The W. C. T. U. of this place have been favored with a visit from Mrs. J. K. Barney of Providence R. I., a lady of pleasing address and good ability. Gospel, and prison work were her themes, and very impressively did she enjoin upon all, who would do good work, to feel it to be the Lord's work, and to be done in His spirit, it must commence with humble, earnest, definite prayer. By illustrations she showed where this is omitted, how soon comes impatience and discouragement.

Her words on prison work will doubtless cause our union to enter upon that important, but hitherto neglected field.

She showed how heart and head are needed to give power; the union of love and knowledge gives useful work. Our union has been asked to petition for suffrage as a temperance movement, but has declined; not from opposition to woman suffrage but from doubting the utility of joining the two reforms; thinking there is more surety of hitting the mark if the aim is at but one object.

MISSOURI.

Butler.—For the benefit of our cause I want to say a few words about our work in this place. We organized April 18, 1883. The society has since progressed slowly but surely and is now doing good work. I want to tell you of one way we took to raise money for our work. July 4, 1883, there was to be an industrial parade here.

The ladies conceived the idea of having our society represented also. So we arranged a wagon with appropriate draperies, flags and mottoes, in which sat our president with as many children as could be seated, dressed in white, with banners bearing the inscription "Hope", all drawn by a span of white horses. Then we had a temperance booth where we sold iced tea, ice cream, lemonade, and gave meals in any way to suit purchasers. For this privilege we were charged by the committee (who were saloon keepers) ten dollars, and yet we cleared sixty dollars and seventy-five cents.

We had Mrs. Laura Fixen the 5th and 6th of March, 1884, who spoke to a crowded house. We feel that her talk made some prohibitionists and did a vast amount of good.

Mrs. M. E. Walley, Pres. of Bates Co.

Springfield.—The work with us goes steadily on. Meetings of the league which combines under one organization all temperance societies in town are held regularly every week, also a union service of all the churches once a month. Gospel meetings of W. C. T. U. alternate on Sunday p. m. with the Band of Hope, which starts in a most flourishing manner with between twenty and thirty large classes. The W. C. T. U. assisted the young ladies in forming an organization which gives good promise for the future. A free kindergarten and a kitchen garden are among the plans for the immediate future. A room has been secured which will be kept open as temperance headquarters, reading room, etc. An effort is being made to obtain good lecturers to follow Mr. George Woodford, whose late work in our place has been fraught with so much of good, and whose high standard on all questions was warmly seconded, and will be sustained by our ladies.

It is hoped the thirteenth district convention may come to Springfield. If it does not a good delegation will attend from here wherever it may go.

H. C. Miller, Press Correspondent

MINNESOTA.

Winnebago.—Our union proposes to send a copy of Professor Foster's "Shall we License the Dram Shop?" To every voter in the village. We are strongly threatened with license at our next municipal election (the second of April,) and we women intend to clear our skirts by placing in a plain way before our voters the evils induced by the saloons, and the actual sin and responsibility which rests upon them if they by their vote license them. The past year we have had no license through the influence and efforts and prayers of the W. C. T. U. We have driven the liquor dealers into the closest kind of quarters, where although it is true we cannot so readily get at them, still we feel that they cannot long continue in this way. Three prosecutions for illegal liquor selling resulting in convictions and fines within the last three months has had the tendency to drive the business behind locks and keys where they hope to hold it until the spring election, when if license is voted and a license board elected, they will be in readiness to flaunt their sign again to the public. Our W. C. T. U. feel that we have gained a victory in thus having driven them into these dark places and hope that with no license vote and board that the opportunity may be given by which we can finally drive the business out of our town entirely.

E. J. Holley, Pres. W. C. T. U.

SOUTHERN CALIFORNIA.

We consist of fifteen unions, four organized before Miss Willard came, and one organized by Miss Willard. The remaining ten were organized last fall by Mrs. Leavitt.

There has been a steady increase in membership since the September convention, and a spirit of earnestness and interest prevails in all the unions. We have now eight superintendents of departments, are represented in ten, if not more, of the newspapers of this section, have made some progress towards getting temperance instruction into the schools, have organized several Bands of Hope, and had just made arrangements for the organization of unions in several towns in this vicinity when the storm begun, and we have been obliged to call a halt.

Several towns report reading rooms established with profit, and steps are being taken towards a coffee house and reading room in Los Angeles. Mrs. Skelton is with us, and her enthusiasm is so contagious that we pray with fresh faith and courage.

ILLINOIS.

The following circulars prepared by our state superintendent of Sunday school work, have been sent out very generally, but if more are desired Mrs. Tyng will gladly furnish them on application to her at Peoria:

He that is not with Me is against Me,
And he that gathereth not with Me scattereth abroad.
Matt. 13: 30.

For this purpose the Son of God was manifested,
That He might destroy the works of the Devil.
I John 3: 8.

To the Superintendents of the Sunday Schools of the State of Illinois:

Dear Brethren:—We desire to urge upon you the prayerful consideration of the plan proposed by the Woman's Christian Temperance Union, that the quarterly lessons, (or what is styled the thirteenth Sabbath) should be devoted to the subject of temperance. We would most earnestly press the claims of this subject for a special place in the teachings of the Sunday school for the following reasons:

1st. Because the Sabbath school is the most important, blessed, and far-reaching agency for the moral and religious training of our children and youth of our country. We look to it to send forth a generation of men and women, not only exhibiting in their lives all the sweet graces of the Spirit, but also those who shall be brave defenders of the faith, and outspoken champions of the right, and courageous opposers of all that is evil. It needs no prophet's vision to predict, that in a country where the institution we call a "saloon" is upheld and protected by law, where its doors are thrown wide open upon the corners of our streets, where $700,000,000 of money is annually expended, and where even the government of the nation is largely controlled by it, that the coming generation, now being trained in the Sunday schools of our land, will have to meet and solve the great problem of our nation's life or death. In such an emergency, in the face of such a sin, and the danger which it threatens, is it not fitting that the Sunday schools should give temperance the special place which the importance of the subject demands, and speak upon it with no uncertain sound?

2d. We would claim this earnest teaching upon the subject of temperance, for the personal benefit of the scholars. Youth is the time when deep and abiding impressions may be made—it is also the time of peculiar temptations, and the face of this tempter has grown so familiar on all our streets, that earnest and solemn words of warning need often to be spoken. Doubtless, many frequenters of the saloon today are graduates from the Sunday school, and might say, "My Sunday school teacher never warned me of the danger:" now the habit is fixed, and it is too late!

3d. We would claim that there is power enough in the gospel of Christ, if properly taught, to overthrow this great sin of this Christian nation. Shall Mohammedanism, which has rid its followers from the sin of intemperance, have more power than the glorious gospel of our Lord and Savior?

We would jealously claim for it its own exalted place of defender of all that is pure and true, and blessed, and opposer of all that is vile, and debasing, and blighting—its glory would we not give to another.

Having been a member of the Sunday school all my life, and during twenty-two years a teacher of two classes every Sunday, I am second to none in my interest in the purity, as well as efficiency and responsibility of Sunday school work, and therefore felt constrained to urge this matter upon you as one of your own number.

Yours, in the Master's service,

Lucie B. Tyng,
Sup't of S. S. Department Illinois W. C. T. U.
Peoria, March 1, 1884.

For this purpose the Son of God was manifested, that He might destroy the works of the devil—I John 3: 8.

To the W. C. T. Unions of Illinois.

Dear Friends:—I enclose you the circular of the National Superintendent of Sunday school work, in the "Woman's Christian Temperance Union," with the request that in every local union, one person should be appointed to have this department in charge. Her work will be, personally to present this subject to superintendents of Sunday schools in her vicinity, and try to induce them to introduce into their schools on the four Sundays of the year which the Sunday school committee have left open, the Temperance lessons prepared for the Woman's Christian Temperance Union. I send one of these lessons as a specimen, and in Miss Kimball's circular you will find a list of those already prepared. These, as well as the circular, can be obtained in any quantity, at 161 LaSalle street, Chicago.

It is my earnest desire that these lessons, or kindred ones, be universally used in our Sunday schools, and I am persuaded that no part of our work offers so sure and well founded a hope of success and usefulness as this. That we may faithfully do all that is in our power in this direction, and that God may give this cause favor in the eyes of our brethren in Sunday school work, and prosper it according to His will, is my earnest prayer.

Yours affectionately,

Lucie B. Tyng,

Decatur.—Mrs. Lucy Simpson has been holding a series of meetings in Decatur. She began her work February 24, and delivered eight lectures. The meetings were held in our tabernacle, the largest audience room in our city, which was crowded nightly. She returned March 10 and delivered four more lectures, and is engaged to return April 11 and remain until our city election.

One of our prominent German citizens said that if she would return he would see that she was paid, which shows that our German population is being influenced upon the subject of temperance.

A good work has been commenced among the colored people of our city, fifty-seven of them signed the pledge one evening. Maggie E. Crissey, corresponding secretary; treasurer, Miss Fannie Briston; organist, Miss Ellenoro Rogan.

The executive committee of the ninth district met in Eureka, Tuesday, March 11, at the residence of Mrs. F. Hoyt. Seven of its ten members were present. The object of the meeting was to discuss and complete plan of work for the year. A part of this plan is to hold a convention in each of the six counties of our district during the year. Miss Shedd read an excellent program, prepared by Elder Chaffee, for a five day's temperance camp meeting at Eureka, beginning August 15, 1884. Each of our superintendents seems fully impressed with the importance of the work in her department, and anxious to do all that can be done in her line of work. The financial plan adopted at our late convention meets with general favor among our local unions. Miss Emily Shedd, our new president, enters upon her duties with great enthusiasm.

Alice Briggs, District Secretary.

WASHINGTON TERRITORY.

Port Townsend.—At the last regular meeting of our local W. C. T. U. one dear sister said, "I always look through my Union Signal for news from Washington territory and see something from all the other states and territories but never a word from ours." Another said, "They don't even know we are alive." Now this letter is to inform you that we are "alive," thoroughly so, indeed we are almost too busy to write, but we feel so proud of our success that we want to see our name in print.

Our union was formed in the early part of June last by Mrs. Switzer, with ten or twelve members. On the 2d of July we were blessed with a visit from "our" beloved Miss Willard through whose magnetic influence we received large additions in membership and much encouragement.

We have now thirty-six working members and eight honorary members which seems a marvelous growth. At nearly every meeting too we receive some new members which shows a steady improvement in our organization. We meet regularly once in two weeks on Tuesday evening and have very interesting sessions.

Our chief efforts have been in the line of establishing a public library and reading room and we have been so successful that we expect to make quite a presentable beginning very soon. A committee of our W. C. T. U. went through the village on a thorough canvass and secured by subscription and cash $230 which has since been increased to $360 by two lectures, a literary entertainment and a basket festival. This last was such an enjoyable affair as to deserve further comment. It was conducted on this wise: Invitations were sent out for a social gathering on a certain evening at the hall. Every lady made a pretty little basket and filled it with a dainty lunch for two, placing her card under the napkin cover. At the close of the evening the baskets were auctioned off to the gentlemen present, and every purchaser enjoyed the contents with the lady whose card was found in his basket.

There was much merriment over the auction and some of the baskets brought handsome figures which gladdened the faithful heart of the W. C. T. U.

Privately, let it be understood that each basket contained enough lunch for three or four, and that there was moreover, a table conveniently near, loaded with good things so that all might be bountifully served.

Satan's strongholds in our midst are so many, so influential, and so powerful, from a moneyed point of view, that it requires Spartan courage and large faith in God to enter the lists against them.

But "the cause" lies very near our hearts and we are united in our determination to wage uncompromising warfare against the liquor traffic which has so long and so woefully cursed and enslaved our town.

A drama is in preparation to be given in the interest of the W. C. T. U.

Temperance sentiment is yet a very tender plant and in unhealthy soil but we are tending it with gentle, fostering care and are glad to feel and see that it is gaining both stature and vigor. A Member.

IOWA.

CLAY COUNTY.

As the question of finances is being so much agitated I thought perhaps my mite on the subject might not come amiss. Our president, secretary, and treasurer, live in Spencer and they planned to give a basket sociable for the benefit of our county treasury. It was quite a success, netting our society about eighteen dollars, and we think it paid. Our cause is not hindered for the lack of of a little money to use at the right time, and altogether we have a peaceful, happy, restful feeling, that we could not have with an empty money box. It is our intention to give before long another entertainment.

We expect to have our county convention the 31st of May, continuing over the Sabbath, and we have engaged Mrs. Laura G. Fixen to be with us at that time.

A new union was organized by Mrs. M. J. Janes on the 9th inst., making ten organizations in Clay county. We have lately sent five new yearly subscriptions to our beloved Union Signal.

Eva Soer Gilchrist, Secretary Clay County.

The regular semi-annual meeting of the W. C. T. U. of Iowa will be held at Ft. Dodge, April 8 to 12 inclusive. A full attendance is desired.

The following officers, according to Sec. 1, Art. 4, of the constitution, constitute the executive committee: The general officers, vice-presidents, our agents and superintendents of the different departments of work. Each officer is requested to present a written summary of her work. Mary J. Aldrich, Prest.

SOUTHERN GLEANINGS.

BY MRS. GEORGIA HULSE MCLEOD.

Maryland.—This state with its appropriate motto, "Womanly words, and manly deeds" has in its united forces for the temperance cause made within the year most encouraging advance.

The second state quarterly meeting just held was unusually well attended.

Resolutions of sympathy were passed, and ordered sent to the friends of Mrs. Gen. Nye, a state vice president, whose death is felt as an irreparable loss.

A resolution was read that had been passed by the Maryland state grange, indorsing the work of Woman's Christian Temperance Union.

Mrs. McLeod presented letters expressing the high opinion entertained by southern women of Miss Henrietta G. Moore. Mrs. Thomas also spoke of her reputation as an advocate of prohibition, adding that prohibition is absolutely necessary for the freedmen of the south, who seem to consider drinking as one of their especial rights and privileges.

The following appeal to the legislature was submitted and endorsed, also one to the voters of Maryland, this last Mrs. McLeod was requested to insert in every paper in Maryland, especially in the German press.

Mrs. Fuller, of St. Louis, Mo., who was present made some earnest remarks on the subject of constitutional amendment.

The committees reported completed arrangements for the meetings to be held by Mrs. Emily McLaughlin of Massachusetts, the 15th and 22d.

APPEAL.

To the Honorable, the General Assembly of Maryland:

The Woman's Christian Temperance Union of Maryland and the undersigned citizens of the state recognizing the futility of all effort to control by license, the appalling results which invariably accompany and follow the traffic in alcoholic liquors of all descriptions, respectfully present this memorial, praying that your honorable bodies will take such measures as shall lead to an amendment of the constitution of the state of Maryland, forever prohibiting the manufacture and sale of all intoxicating liquors.

The women of Maryland have taken their stand for prohibition and intend to follow the example of the importunate widow of the Scriptures, ask until they receive.

Georgia.—All honor to the brave persistent work of the women, whose president, Mrs. Sibley, wields such a keen pen and whose influence is a power. The prohibition sentiment is gaining ground in the rural sections of the state. Last week Whitfield and Ohio counties voted in favor of prohibition by more than two to one. In both the colored voters went almost unanimously for prohibition. Mrs. Chapin's wonderful influence among the colored folk is proved by this fulfillment of their pledge to her.

Miss Henrietta G. Moore, of Ohio, who has won such golden opinions in the far south, has been invited to visit in the near future, North Carolina, Virginia, and Maryland.

ARKANSAS.

The annual convention of the Arkansas Woman's Christian Temperance Union will be held at Forrest City, the 14th of May, 1884. It is expected that able speakers from abroad and from different parts of the state will be in attendance.

Mrs. M. A. Cornelius, Prest.

NEWS IN A NUTSHELL.

The J. Ellen Foster Band of Hope, of Louisville, Ky., taught by Mr. McGill at the First English Lutheran church, numbers 133. Its officers are all children.

The Y. W. C. T. U. of Oil City, Pa., are deeply interested in the plan of the souvenir and jewelry fund and have sent Miss Pugh two gold pencils, a silver perfume stand, and a silver cup.

A very interesting series of meetings led by George Woodford, has just closed in Nevada, Mo. Crowded houses greeted Mr. Woodford every night. About 450 signed the pledge and a Band of 280 strong was organized.

A new temperance organization has just been formed in Portland, Me., to be known as the "Law and Order League of Portland." Dr. Carleton Kimball, a brother of Miss Lucia E. F. Kimball, is one of the leaders in the movement.

Over ten thousand signatures were obtained for the petition to the Rhode Island general assembly, asking that body to submit to the people an amendment to the constitution prohibiting the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors in this state.

At the regular monthly gospel temperance meeting of the Grafton (W. Va.) union, the following pledge was presented and received eighteen signatures: "We, the undersigned solemnly promise not to invite others to drink, nor to drink with others upon their invitations, nor to pay for drinks at any place of entertainment or club."

A sumptuous dinner was given by the ladies of the W. C. T. U. of Martinsburg, W. Va., on the occasion of their anniversary here of the foundation of their association. A number of invited guests were present, among whom were Miss Jennie Smith, R. R. Supt. of the N. W. C. T. U., and Miss Adelaide Sherman. Their presence cheered the ladies of this branch union, and their many friends here were glad to see them.

ANNOUNCEMENTS.

We have secured Dr. Herrick Johnson's matchless indictment of High License recently read by him before the prohibition conference in Chicago, for publication, and it will appear in our next issue. We shall issue this in Leaflet form, making it No. 3 in the series of License Leaflets now being issued from this office.

We are in receipts of many letters testifying to the good results of circulating these tracts. In two towns it is claimed that no-license tickets were elected solely through their influence. There is nothing equal to them in creating sentiment in favor of no-license.

Do not fail to order a supply before election day. Price 30c. per hundred, postpaid. Address The Union Signal, 161 LaSalle street.

The Union Signal and The Amendment Herald, one year for $2.25.

The Union Signal and Our Herald (Mrs. Helen M. Gougar's paper) will be sent to one address for $2. per year.

Shall We License the Dram Shop? and How the Dram Shops Pay the Taxes are the titles of two articles by Geo. E. Foster, which have just been issued by The Union Signal, in the form of handbills convenient for circulation. They are splendid arguments against license, and should be widely distributed before the coming spring elections. Price 30c. per hundred postpaid. Address The Union Signal, 161 LaSalle street, Chicago.

ANOTHER Special Offer.

Arrangements have been made with the publishers by which we are enabled to offer Tunison's Matchless, Historical County, Railroad, Distance and Index Map of the United States, and Illustrated Map of the World, as a Premium upon exceptionally good terms.

A double map, about four by five feet in size, mounted on rollers, bound with tape, colored, varnished and finished in the highest style of the art, with reversible attachment; shows the states on the largest scale possible to give the whole United States on one sheet. The counties are about one inch square, each in separate color, and the names are bold and plain. With each map is supplied, free of cost, a copy of "Tunison's Rapid County Finder, or Index," giving complete index of position and population of every county in the United States, by a superior method, used and adopted in the official publications of the government.

The style of engraving has never before been equaled; the names of the counties and county seats stand out bold and plain, and the diamond lettering enables us to show thousands of stations and postoffices not shown in other maps.

The map was constructed by the most accomplished draughtsmen and engravers, is based on government surveys, official railroad information, and its accuracy is unequaled, four to twenty years newer in design, possessing every quality and merit, and justly deserves the character expressed in its title, "matchless, historical, county, railroad, distance and index map."

This map shows all the new counties correct to date, including the thirty-two (32) new counties made last year. It also shows where every tribe of Indians is located, and gives the number inhabiting each reservation. Also shows all the new western surveys, mining towns and stage stations, and every post office in the west.

The rivers are double lined as far as navigable, enabling us to tell how far boats can ascend any river.

This is also a complete railroad and distance map, giving the names of the railroads printed on them, so we can tell what railroad to take to go to any town or place, and the distance is marked between the stations with figures; thus we can find the shortest route, cost of travel, and exact distance between any two places.

On the reverse side are three complete maps of the world; also separate maps of Europe, Egypt and the Holy Land.

The globular map (in hemispheres) shows the world round, as it actually is, and on a flattened scale, as it appears to us in traveling over it, and is one of the latest and best maps of the world published, showing latest discoveries in the Arctic regions, giving the explorations of the "Hall" and the "Herald Jeannette" expeditions, showing the islands discovered and named by them, within 400 miles of the north pole.

We have in this map the ocean routes of inter-communication, with distances marked from port to port; telegraph cables in the different oceans, and the routes of African explorations from the beginning of this century to those of Livingstone and Stanley.

Below the map of the world is a "Chart of the World," on Mercator's projection, showing voyages of discovery from earliest times to the present date. Names of navigators and the date of the voyages are given alongside each route. The degrees of heat and cold are given by Isothermal lines crossing those countries having same average temperature.

The distribution of races of mankind (illustrated by typical heads, in primary and secondary varieties, as taught by Prof. Guyot), is shown by a system of parallel rulings at different angles, covering the face of inhabited countries. The prevailing religions of the various countries are also shown, defined by different colors. Points of greatest depth in the several oceans, from official soundings are shown.

The small globes show the animal and vegetable life of both continents, arranged according to the zones to which they are native, with explanatory text. Bordering the globular map of the world are the eighty-one flags of the world. In the lower left hand quarter is our diamond map of Europe, and in the lower right hand quarter is our topographical map of the Holy Land, with ancient and modern names, showing modern Egypt in detail, railroad system, Suez Canal, Delta of the River Nile, the Sinaitic peninsula, etc. A map of the ancient world shows the travels of St. Paul, as recorded in Holy Writ, besides names and locations of places mentioned in the New Testament, the route of the wanderings of the Israelites from Egypt into Canaan, is shown according to reliable modern Bible scholars.

The columns on the sides show the different coins used in all parts of the world, giving the value of each in United States money. And in the triangular spaces we have a condensed historical and statistical description of the world. The variations of time in different parts of the world is shown by an original system. Clock dials, fifteen degrees apart, show the time of day at all places on those meridians when it is noon at London and "just the way the clocks tick all around the world." At the top are original illustration showing the costumes, and architectures, also a landscape scene in the principal nations of the world.

This map contains more than 100 illustrations. Among them are views of celebrated places, cathedrals, places, etc., of the Old World, and engravings of the government buildings in Washington—capitol, treasury, patent office, postoffice, department of the navy, war, and state, White House, etc., and many engravings of natural scenery, and great engineering works in the United State, with measurements and descriptions. No brief description can do this great work justice But you can see this map is far ahead of all others. The publisher claims ten improvments: First, the distance marked between stations; second, names on the railroads; third, small towns given; fourth, the new counties; fifth, the new surveys; sixth, the "sea shell" tint colors; seventh eighth, three maps of the world; rivers double lined as far as navigable; ninth, separate maps of Egypt, the Holy Land Europe; and tenth, the more than 100 illustrations forming a pictorial history of the world, showing what kind of people inhabit each country, styles of their dress, structures they build, houses they live in; a landscape view in each; and the political subdivisions; prevailing religions; degrees of heat and cold; products and exports; animals common there; the flag of the nation; the coins from lowest to highest denomination, and value of each in our money. Then, with the views of palaces, cathedrals, places, cities, etc., we have a complete pictorial history of the world. Retail price of the Map and Index Book, $4.00.

BRAIN AND NERVE FOOD.

FROM THE NERVE-GIVING PRINCIPLES OF THE OX-BRAIN and WHEAT GERM.

VITALIZED PHOSPHITES.—Restores the energy lost by nervousness, weakness or indigestion; relieves lassitude and neuralgia; refreshes the nerves tired by worry, excitement or excessive sensitiveness, and strengthens a failing memory. It aids wonderfully in the mental and bodily growth of infants and children. Under its use the teeth come easier, the bones grow better, the skin smoother, the brain acquires more readily and rests and sleeps more sweetly. An ill fed brain learns no lessons, and is excusable if peevish. It gives a more intellectual and happier childhood. It does away with that feeling of weakness and exhaustion which impels to the use of alcoholic beverages, and directly counteracts a cause of depravity and suffering which has baffled the efforts of religion and morality. ## Signal Notes.

Out of 1,081 criminals convicted in Iowa, 380 were saloon keepers.

Bishop Simpson says that the rum traffic will be finally overthrown by woman suffrage.

The Indians say there are five murders and fifty fights in every barrel of whisky.

There are five hundred magisterial districts in Kentucky where the sale of liquor is prohibited.

The Cumberland Presbyterian says high license is a mere subterfuge to draw attention from prohibition.

In Illinois 95,000 women expressed a wish to vote against saloons. Not one in ten refused to so express herself.

A new party has been formed in Michigan called the Union party. Its foundation principle is prohibition.

Several English life insurance companies charge twenty per cent. less to total abstainers than to moderate drinkers.

In Danville, Ky., where prohibition has prevailed for many years, a recent election showed only forty-one license advocates out of a vote of 582.

Senator Wilson, of Ia., says the republican party will execute the will of the people and pass a prohibitory law.

The reformed Presbyterian church resolve thus in regard to the only living issue in our land:

Resolved, That we rejoice in in the growing favor in which prohibition is being held, and we pledge ourselves anew to the principle, and to the use of every legitimate means for the securing of constitutional prohibition in the several states which we represent.

The Boston Traveller, commenting upon the pending bonded whisky scheme, says: "The extension of the time of payment would make the government a more active partner in the whisky business than it is already." Just so. And the pecuniary advantage would be all on the side of the whisky-ring and the political corruptionists. It is quite time that this partnership was dissolved.—National Temperance Advocate.

The extraordinary peril to which a beer drinker is subject is evinced in the death of W. J. Flynn, of this city, from a slight bruise, and now the following is published: "Men working about the English breweries and drinking beer constantly, dare not so much as scratch their hands on a nail without fear of lock-jaw, or strike their shins against a step, lest the leg have to be amputated."

Professor Scott, of the Chicago Theological Seminary, who has, it is said, had extensive opportunity for observation in Germany, is reported as saying in a recent address: Germany is probably sinking in immorality and crime more rapidly than any other nation in Europe. In some of the cities half the births are illegitimate. In ten years saloons have increased by fifty per cent., and the people are fast becoming sodden with their immoderate beer drinking.

The Christian Home says very pertinently: When the public mind shall have been enlightened, and the false but firm beliefs and rank prejudices which are deeply rooted in our society shall have been eradicated, as they surely will be by the present methods of temperance education, prohibition will surely follow as a matter of course. It is as absurd to say that prohibition is impracticable by society as to say that total abstinence is impracticable by the individual. It is impracticable only when the moral principle is lacking.

Prohibitory ideas are marching on. The United States senate, on Thursday, voted to prohibit the manufacture, importation or sale of intoxicants in the territory of Alaska, where liquors are doing no more mischief than in many other parts of the country. The senate has already voted to prohibit the sale of intoxicants in the senate restaurant. The senate is on the right track. Unluckily, the house is in a less hopeful state; for it is said the house restaurant continues to supply liquors to all comers. The house restaurant is under the direction of the house.—Lewiston Journal.

Miscellaneous Selections.

A Baptist preacher, referring to the "rare wines" now offered at the White House, says they were "much rarer" in the days of Mrs. Hayes.

Some one commending King Philip for drinking freely, Demosthenes replied: "That is a good quality in a sponge, but not in a king."

Wise men mingle mirth with their cares, as a help either to forget or overcome them; but to resort to intoxication for the ease of one's mind is to cure melancholy by madness.

Cincinnati has six miles of rumholes. New York has seventeen and London seventy-three—almost a hundred miles in three cities. And what a road to travel! Flooded by scalding tears, lined with broken hearts!

There is an old proverb which says: "You can not get more out of a bottle than was put in it." This is a mistake. A man can get out all that was put in the bottle, and in addition he can get $10 or thirty days.

Nashua, Iowa, has had its first experience in enforcing the prohibitory law, and recently seized, and spilled upon the ground three twenty gallon casks of whisky, and one five gallon cask of brandy, and one ten gallon cask of rum. All the result of Miss Jennie Bradford's complaint before Justice Billings.

At a meeting the other night a gentleman was asked if he expected to succeed in carrying all the towns for no license, and in electing a full prohibition ticket in each town. He answered he hadn't time to think about that. His Bible, he said, did not read, "Well done, thou good and successful servant, but faithful servant," and he thought the faithful servants would be the most successful candidates for God's favor when he comes to issue the certificates for election in Heaven.—Steuben Signal.

THE PENOGRAPH.—For more than thirty years [illegible] has industriously labored to produce a perfectly automatic fountain pen. Numero[illegible], possessing various degrees of merit, have been patented and extensively sold; and most of t[illegible] have worked splendidly till one or more of their delicate parts gave out and had to be repaired. But all defects hitherto encountered have been remedied in what is termed the Penograph. In the Penograph all small and complicated contrivances are dispensed with. Although the pen appears to be small it will write just as well as the largest. It is capable of producing the finest hair lines as well as heavy shaded strokes. The pen is of solid gold, first quality diamond pointed. With fair usage it will last a lifetime. The case is vulcanized rubber, handsomely finished. In our opinion the Penograph, as illustrated above, is well calculated to supercede all other writing pens and pencils in daily use. Its flow of ink is automatic and free, but never too profuse. It sheds ink when in use and stops when the pen ceases to move. It needs no wiping and no dipping for ink. It is carried in the pocket always ready for use on any kind of paper. It costs no more than is usually charged for a first class gold pen and [illegible]older without the fountain. It is fully warranted and may be returned if it fails to meet the expectations of any person who shall read the above. Price $3, postpaid. An extra pen will be given to any subscriber who shall send us $9 for a club of three Penographs. All postpaid.

A large edition of this intensely interesting and instructive book has been placed at our disposal by the publishers, and we are enabled to offer it to our subscribers at a wonderfully low price.

The author's biographer, speaking of the circumstances under which this book was written, says:

Although cut off by his protracted confinement from all opportunity of public preaching, he was, in the overruling providence of God, more extensively useful than while in the enjoyment of unfettered liberty; for having during his leisure hours exerted the extraordinary talents with which he was endowed, he produced the PILGRIM'S PROGRESS—a work which has been more extensively circulated, and done more good in the world than any other book except the Bible alone."

The great popularity of this book is shown in the fact that it has been translated into every language on the continent of Europe.

It should be in every family. Parents can give no better instruction to their children than by laying before them a copy of this excellent book.

GENERAL OFFICERS OF THE NATIONAL W. C. T. U.,

RELATIVE TO THE NON-APPEARANCE OF THE GREAT MEMORIAL.

HEADQUARTERS, 16 EAST 14TH ST., NEW YORK, March 15, 1884.

To all Members of the W. C. T. U.:

DEAR SISTERS:—Nearly five months have elapsed since the Detroit convention and you have heard nothing from the Prohibition Memorial there agreed upon. The General Officers to whom the work of carrying out that agreement was entrusted owe it to you no less than to themselves, that a full explanation be given of the delay which has rendered it impracticable to circulate the memorial in the manner desired by the majority, i. e., universally throughout the nation.

The convention at Detroit adjourned on Saturday, Nov. 3, and the general officers supposed that a great memorial to congress and the political parties, universally circulated and asking for action in favor of national constitutional prohibition, had been agreed upon with practical unanimity by the delegates from twenty-seven states represented at Detroit.

Our Executive Committee met on Monday, Nov. 5, all unfinished business having been referred to that committee for final settlement. In the afternoon session the question was asked: "Who shall be responsible to carry out the vast amount of detail work involved in the convention's action relative to the prohibition memorial?"

The astounding fact was then developed that some had voted for a memorial officially signed by the general officers, but not generally circulated, and it was stated that the Plan of Work committee had so reported. The president said this could not be, for the reason that the chairman of that committee had told her, that "the committee was going to report on the subject of the memorial in the exact language of the president's recommendation in her annual address." As there was no debate or explanation at the time the Plan of Work was acted upon, the inference seemed a fair one, that, no matter what the Plan of Work committee intended, the convention understood a memorial on the largest scale possible to be secured by circulation throughout the United States, for this was clearly the recommendation of the president.

In this most difficult dilemma, and under the head of "unfinished business," the executive committee now proceeded carefully, after a most solemn season of prayer, to discuss and determine what should be done, and finally the nineteen members present voted with but one dissenting voice, to adopt the following:

Resolved, That the executive committee authorize the general officers to carry out in detail so far as possible, the suggestion of the president's address of a memorial to the national political conventions of 1884, and a duplicate of the same to congress.

Concerning this action the entry in the minutes is as follows:

After long discussion and earnest prayer the ayes and noes were called, and in full * committee each member present voted aye. By motion unanimously adopted, the president was requested and authorized to prepare the great petition called in the "Tabulated Recommendations" of her annual address a memorial. (See annual minutes, page 44.)

A few days after this the president started on her projected trip involving twenty states, speaking often of the great memorial as a projected undertaking of the National W. C. T. U., and finding it cordially endorsed by temperance people. She also prepared the memorial, as authorized by the executive committee (after advising with able lawyers) and in good faith presented it to the Baptist and Methodist "ministers' meetings" in Boston, December 10, 1883, which heartily endorsed the movement and gave their signatures to the number of 109. Meanwhile the recording secretary in her capacity of president of the Ohio W. C. T. U., sent for the plans for the campaign in her own state, which she had pledged for four hundred thousand of the one million signatures upon which the national Executive Committee has informally agreed as the maximum to be sought. The president prepared an article to accompany the memorial (see document III) and forwarded both to THE UNION SIGNAL, our national organ, with special request that they should appear in the memorial number, of which an edition of forty thousand copies was to be issued, hoping by this means to bring the enterprise before the whole country previous to the week of prayer. But meanwhile, letters came to the president showing strong dissatisfaction on the part of some who were in prominent positions in our National Union, and taking the ground that the action of the Executive Committee at Detroit antagonized that of the Plan of Work committee, and exceeded the former's legitimate powers.

In view of these considerations and the retrospective character of the memorial number, the president's article and accompanying memorial were withheld by the Business Committee of our national organ. The fact was soon developed that Illinois was strongly adverse to the general circulation of the memorial, having become disgusted by the repeated rejection of its great petitions to the state legislature, and being convinced that a farther appeal to the old parties would be in vain. The national president had in the Detroit executive committee pledged her own state for two hundred thousand names which, under these circumstances could hardly be secured.

It was also learned that the executive committee of Michigan had voted not to co-operate and a similar sentiment was reported from Iowa, Massachusetts and Rhode Island. When the attitude of Illinois was ascertained by the president, she suggested to the four other general officers, that in view of disagreement between executive and plan of work committees and non-co-operation of Illinois, the general circulation of the memorial be given up, and that the responsibility for non-action be assumed by the five general officers. But the four officers thus appealed to, felt that the responsibility for the "masterly inactivity" suggested by the president was greater than they were ready to assume. Of the replies sent by them, that of Miss Pugh is given as embodying their general sentiment:

The enclosed suggestion to hold back the great memorial for national prohibition reached me today and I have given the whole matter earnest consideration. Never in the executive committee, in my experience, was such serious, prayerful care, given to any subject as was given to this at Detroit and never did anything go forth from us so baptized with the influence of the Holy Spirit and this fact makes it a difficult matter to answer to our own consciences and to God for any change without the best of reasons, and I fail to find any given. It is said there is a want of harmony between plan of work committee and executive committee. At the time this was passed upon there was no plan of work committee in existence, it had ceased when its report was accepted by the convention and the executive committee was left with full power to act within the constitution, till the next annual meeting. The executive committee voted upon the matter of the petition (as brought up in Miss Willard's address) and thus fully under head of "unfinished business", adopted it and constituted the general officers a committee to take it in charge, to carry out in the most effectual manner as to plan and detail. I do not understand that we now have any power to decline to fulfil our charge unless it be impossible to do so. We were appointed to execute, not to consider, the consideration was given in the full board. As I have given this plan to men of power and intelligence and influence, they have most fully endorsed it, seeing in it the hope of the future and we must have good cause for a failure in our trust now.

I certainly give our beloved president credit for having the best of reasons for her present attitude and it grieves me much to appear to differ from her. But I cannot without further knowledge withdraw from the position which I took at Detroit. ESTHER PUGH.
Treas. N. W. C. T. U.

The executive committee was then convened at Indianapolis, Feb. 20. (It may here be appropriately stated that though these various steps do not follow each other rapidly, they have been taken just as fast as was possible in view of the widely severed constituency to be consulted, and the delay in letters owing to absences, etc.)

After careful consideration the members present at Indianapolis, barely a quorum, adopted the following resolution:

Notwithstanding a seeming necessary delay, the executive committee after careful consideration, believing the convention understood in its acceptance of the report of the Plan of Work committee, the issuing of a petition for the signatures of the people, as definitely outlined in the president's address, requests that it be immediately prepared and circulated.

*i. e., As full as usual after the convention.

Probably the chief reason for this action was that as but three of the executive committee were present, aside from four of the general officers, the former (Mrs. Lathrop, of Michigan, Mrs. Wells, of Indiana, and Miss West, of Illinois) could not well advise the latter to act contrary to the decision of the executive committee at Detroit with a large number of members present.

(From the foregoing statement Miss West's name should be excepted, as she consistently represented her state by voting at Detroit and Indianapolis against the general circulation of the memorial.)

Mrs. Mary T. Lathrop said at Indianapolis to the committee that she was confident her state would rescind its action and co-operate in circulating the memorial.

The general officers now proceeded with the arrangements so long delayed. The memorial (of which a hundred thousand copies were to have been at once issued) was placed in the printers' hands (see Doc. I.), Mrs. Foster having consented, by telegram, to have her name appended thereto. (See also Doc. II., Methods of circulating the Memorial). And now our editor, to whom, from various parts of the country had come adverse expressions relative to the action of the executive committee at Detroit, offered her resignation on the ground that a memorial numerously signed had not been authorized by the Detroit convention, and she declined to take the attitude of seeming acquiesence in a movement which in her judgment misrepresented the will of the majority. A quorum of the general officers being in Chicago at this time, it was agreed to compromise this difficulty by sending out a circular letter to each delegate and asking how she voted.

The following is the form of said letter:

16 East 14th Street, New York,
February 22, 1884.

My Dear Sister: At the Detroit convention Miss Willard read the following as a part of her annual address:

And now, beloved sisters, standing as we do upon the mount of vision, with the lesson of ten years' work behind us, what is the duty of the hour? We are wiser than we were; our intellects ought to be all aflame with clear and penetrating thought. We are more loving-hearted than we were; our sympathies ought to move with more compassionate enthusiasm to the rescue where the onslaught is most fierce and the crisis most inevitable. We have a steadiness of purpose that comes of faith in God, and our wills ought to fly with resistless sweep to the execution of both thought and sympathy in glowing deeds.

Revolutions never move backward. Pillar of cloud, pillar of fire, where dost thou lead? This question has burned in my heart as I read the news of our defeat in Illinois and Michigan: our victory in the states that having eyes have also seen—the Buckeye and the Hawkeye! Sisters, we must send the plea of "Home, Sweet Home" into the national convention of the republican and democratic parties, when six months hence, they meet to select candidates for the presidency of these United States. Thank God, the nation has one senator who declares his purpose to insist on a prohibitory constitutional amendment plank in the platform of his party.

You know his name: Henry W. Blair, of the Old Granite State. Let us give emphasis to his demand by rolling in such petitions in its support as never before bombarded a political assembly!

Let us redeem the pledge made to the senator when he addressed our Washington* convention by entrenching him behind such towers and bastions of petition as will give decisive courage to the good and bring confusion to the counsels of the base.

At the close of the address Miss Willard tabulated this recommendation in the following words:

For convenience of reference, I have tabulated my recommendations, well knowing that as in the past, they will receive the candid attention of the delegates, and well pleased to abide your decision as to their adoption or rejection at this time.

I recommend:

1. A memorial to the national political conventions of 1884, asking a plank in their platforms which shall declare in favor of an amendment to the national constitution, by which the prohibition of the liquor traffic shall become an integral part of national organic law.

2. A duplicate of this memorial to be presented to congress in 1885.

When the plan of work committee made its report, through Mrs. J. E. Foster, it copied the exact language of this tabulated statement, thus:

12. We recommend a memorial to the national political conventions of 1884, asking a plank in their platform which shall declare in favor of an amendment to the national constitution by which the prohibition of the liquor traffic shall become an integral part of national organic law.

14. We recommend that a memorial be presented to the next congress, asking a submission of a prohibitory amendment to the national constitution.

Now, dear friend, will you please send me by next mail your reply to these questions:

1. In voting on this report of the plan of work committee, did you suppose you were voting for what Miss Willard had plainly described in her address as a petition, (i. e. a memorial with many names attached to it) or did you mean a memorial officially signed by representatives of the National W. C. T. U., but not generally circulated throughout the country?

Please state in full whether you voted for or against a petition memorial [as recommended by Miss Willard] also, in case you did not vote, tell me what you believe to have been the general opinion of the convention on the one question—Shall we petition (by general circulation of the memorial) or shall we merely take to the political conventions and to congress a memorial with a few representative (official) names?

Do not delay over one mail, I beg, if you can possibly avoid it, and please explain in full.

Yours on behalf of the general officers,
Caroline B. Buell, Cor. Sec.

Returns have come in so generally that we feel authorized to give the following summary. All the state presidents have been heard from and of the 25 present at the Detroit convention 18 understood and voted for the prohibition memorial to be universally circulated. All the general officers so understood and so voted.

Number of delegates at Detroit convention, 191.
Number responding to circular, 170.
Number who voted for and understood memorial universally signed, 81.
Number who understood the same but did not vote because of not favoring it, 6.
Absent at time of vote or not voting but understanding general petition, 10.
Number voting for and understanding memorial officially signed, 44.
Absent at time of vote or not voting, but understanding same, 9.
One delegate understood that a memorial both officially and generally signed was intended. Doubtful 19.
Total number who understood memorial numerously signed 97.
Understood memorial officially signed 53.
Doubtful 19.
Understood both 1.
Total 170.

We will make a later statement when all shall have responded, but do not feel warranted in withholding longer this outline of facts. Although the count indicates that the executive committee did not mistake the intention of the majority, it develops an amount of misunderstanding never before approached in our national council. A few extracts from letters will show the conflicting views:

—"In reply to questions will say that as a member of Plan of Work Committee, I voted for a memorial to be sent to the political conventions of 1884, also to Congress. In speaking of a memorial or petition we generally understand one signed by the masses, unless some other method be specified. I do not remember of hearing said committee speak of any particular plan of presenting memorial consequently I inferred that it meant general circulation."

—"The Plan of Work Committee thoroughly discussed the Prohibition memorial matter and emphatically recommended a representative petition of (official) names and not a popular petition signed universally."

—"I voted in this case for a memorial with many names attached, and understanding it to mean the general circulation of petitions through all our borders. In the case of petition to Congress for the passage of the 16th Amendment I voted for a memorial signed by the general officers of the W. C. T. U. because I had found we could not carry the resolution to memorialize by general petition."

—"I voted only on what was regularly before the convention at the time the vote was asked for—viz.: the Report of the Plan of Work Committee, and I interpreted the word 'Memorial' in the Recommendation to mean a statement of what the National Union desired officially signed by its representatives. There is a great difference in the form and style of a memorial and petition.

"I did not vote either for or against a petition-memorial as recommended by Miss Willard, because Miss Willard's address was not before us to be voted upon, nor was the thought contained in her address of the general circulation of a petition brought out in the presentation of the Report of Plan of Work Committee."

—"Did not vote—was attending a committee meeting when the action was taken, but believe almost every one understood that a petition was to be generally circulated throughout the Union."

—"My understanding was a memorial officially signed by representatives of the N. W. C. T. U. I remember the discussion and voted clearly as I have stated."

—"As the wording of the report of Plan of Work Committee was the same as Miss Willard's recommendation, I supposed of course it meant the same, a petition memorial, and as such I voted for it. I did not hear much discussion of the subject. It seemed an accepted fact that this petition should be."

—"I believe that the general opinion of the convention was that a petition with many names attached, was what we were voting upon, and not one merely signed by a few representative or official names. Else how could we 'roll in such petitions as never before bombarded a political assembly.' I voted against a petition memorial because I knew my constituency behind me would not approve of such a measure. I call to mind the animated discussion on this very question."

—"I voted for a long petition to be signed by a million names if we could get them, and do not think any other kind of petition was ever thought or talked of."

—"Understood we were voting for a 'Memorial' in the general acceptation of the word 'memorial,' to be signed simply by the national officers of the W. C. T. U., and this method seems the only action possible, after the vote of that convention."

—"I emphatically understood it was to be a petition memorial, circulated through each state and signed by thousands of petitioners."

—"I voted to send one million names to Congress in a mammoth petition."

—"I certainly understood when voting that what was meant by the recommendation of Miss Willard was a popular petition and that her language transferred to the report of Committee on Plan of Work meant the same thing, viz.—a popular petition."

We believe the explanation of all these "misunderstandings of good people" is largely due to the repeated discussions relative to a petition or memorial for woman's ballot. It was especially explained in the convention and in the executive committee after adjournment of convention, that the word memorial as used in relation to the ballot for woman meant not a generally circulated but merely an officially signed document. Many delegates, therefore, who did not give consecutive attention to the proceedings, were confused as to which was being discussed, the prohibition or the suffrage memorial. The general officers confidently believe that a large majority of the convention were determined against the general circulation of any sort of document relative to suffrage, deeming such action inexpedient, but that they finally compromised on a memorial as defined, in connection with that discussion: viz., a document representatively but not generally signed. But the general officers as confidently believe that the convention desired a national memorial for constitutional prohibition, signed by hundreds of thousands, as indicated by the president in her annual official address. It is objected by some of our noblest and most earnest leaders that the word "memorial" in the president's address was ambiguous and she humbly admits her error in the light (or darkness!) of the trying ordeal she has passed through. But her co-adjutors deem her defense a strong one, embracing the following points:

1. Webster's definition of the word memorial which is as follows: "A written representation of facts made to a legislature or other body, or a representation of facts accompanied with a petition."

2. The president's definition as to the precise kind of memorial to which she referred.

3. The plan of work committee's adoption of her tabulated statement of recommendations.

4. The evident understanding of her meaning by the convention, as proved by the replies to Mrs. Buell's very explicit letter of inquiry, and finally the important precedent furnished by the great petition to congress in 1877 presented by Mrs. Wittenmeyer, circulated throughout the country, containing thirty thousand names and called "The Home Protection Memorial."

The general officers desire to offer the following suggestions for the future:

1. Let us have a by-law making the report of the committee on plan of work and the one on resolutions the special order for the third day morning of the session, and requiring that no action be taken by either of these two chief committees until the roll call proves that two-thirds of the members are present.

2. Let those committees insist on a full discussion of their reports. A single query, a moment of discussion on the 12th and 14th specifications of the plan of work committee's report would have cleared up the confusion of thought and definition from which has resulted untold anxiety and pain. So far as we can learn all the delegates voted affirmatively for the "tabulated statements" as copied by the committee, but how utterly different was the understanding—or the lack of it—behind those votes!

3. Let us all cultivate careful attention and independent judgment on all matters brought before us in the convention with a high sense of honor as to our duty as representatives, our sacred trust and responsibility not for good intentions only, but for clear ideas. Let us determine to be steadily at our posts throughout the entire convention remembering that the closing days and hours are usually those most deeply freighted with results.

4. Let the local committee choose with the utmost care the anditorium in which our national convention is to be held, specially studying its acoustic qualities and the adaptation of its seating arrangements for the purposes of a deliberative assembly.

* At Washington convention we voted to send an immense prohibition petition to congress.

Last and most of all important, let us thank our Heavenly Father that without harsh controversy or alienation He has led us through this most intricate experience. There has been the utmost loyalty as to what the different "parties in interest" believed right, from their divergent points of view, but a sisterly tenderness and regard for each others feelings, a willingness to make concessions, an acknowledgment of mistakes, a teachable spirit, an incalculable amount of prayer.

Let us then "Talk with grateful tongue of storms and trials past, and praise the mighty Pilot who hath brought us through the rapids." Christ's hand was on the helm, for if it had not been, the good ship "National" would not be today in quiet seas. Your general officers declare, with unspeakable gratitude to God, that they believe the "unity of the spirit and the bond of peace" are as strong today as ever, from ocean to ocean, and your president often says that not for a thousand "great memorials" (or "petitions" as the case may be!) would she have jeopardized those priceless relationships between sisterly hearts that make ours a society concerning which skeptics must say "See how these Christians love one another."

God has set us for the defense of a most precious faith. He is schooling us for greater enterprises than we know; teaching us by mistakes, defeats and losses, not less than by fulfillments, the way in which He would have us walk, for after all, what we grow to be is dearer in His sight than all we try to do.

In conclusion we offer, to meet present emergencies, the following suggestions:

1. That, since the time is far spent, we do not circulate the memorial but have it signed in each state and territory by the general officers of the W. C. T. U., one copy being returned to our corresponding secretary, Mrs. C. B. Buell, 16 East Fourteenth street, New York, to be presented to each of the political party conventions by a representative delegation of our own ladies, and the other to be sent directly to the state or territorial delegation in the several party conventions from the several states and territories. This should be done in time for the Greenback National Convention which meets in Indianapolis May 28, the Republican, Chicago, June 3; the Democratic, Chicago July 6, and the Prohibition Home Protection Party (to be announced hereafter.)

2. Although we had a clear majority of the Detroit convention in favor of a great memorial to congress universally circulated, we deem it best because of time lost and in the interest of harmony not to urge farther at this time our view of that mooted question; but to preserve a "masterly inactivity" in relation to the great prohibition memorial to congress as well as to the parties, simply presenting to each a memorial representatively signed by the general officers of the states and territories. A full supply will be at once sent out from national headquarters, also a full supply of the voter's pledge to the home.

3. Lastly we ask your special attention to the following action of the Detroit convention which is undisputed. (See minutes p. 41.)

Resolved, That effort be made to secure in each state and territory, NON-PARTISAN PROHIBITION CONVENTIONS of men and women, before the party nominating conventions are held. At such conventions, effort shall be made to unite electors in declaration that they will vote for no party which has not prohibition of the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors in its platform. These conventions shall adjourn to meet after the last nominating convention has been held."

The central thought in this plan is to arouse and unify the voting force everywhere, and these conventions can be held in connection with spring conventions of the W. C. T. U. throughout the nation, the names of our officers with those of leading temperance men being affixed to the call.

4. The voter's pledge to the home (see document 4) ought, in our judgment to be circulated by each local union, beginning the work at once and keeping it up until in every municipality, state and territory in the nation the elections shall have been held.

We give in full from the electrotype plates, the memorial and documents intended to accompany it, as prepared when general circulation was intended, but our state and territorial presidents will readily understand the erasures necessary in using them according to the present plan.

DEAR SISTERS: We beg you most tenderly, to read with prayer, and intense desire to know and do the duty of the hour, the reasons as well as to study the methods of the accompanying documents, which though prepared for the petition may have been meant, in Heaven's sacred counsels, to help forward this action of the convention relative to THE VOTER'S PLEDGE TO THE HOME

In all this work so great, so glorious to the spirit, but so fatiguing to the flesh, God grant that to each of us the restful promise of the thirty-third Psalm may be realized: "O how great is Thy goodness, which Thou hast laid up for them that fear Thee; which Thou hast wrought for them that trust in Thee before the sons of of men. Thou shalt hide them in the secret of Thy presence from the pride of man; Thou shalt keep them secretly in a pavilion from the strife of tongues."

In this faith we are yours loyally,

TO THE SENATE AND HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES OF THE UNITED STATES IN CONGRESS ASSEMBLED:

We, people of the United States, by this Memorial represented, believe that, while the poison habits of the Nation can be largely restrained by an appeal to the intellect through argument, to the heart through sympathy and to the conscience through the motives of religion, THE TRAFFIC IN THOSE POISONS will be best controlled by PROHIBITORY LAW.

We believe the teachings of Science, Experience and the Golden Rule combine to testify against the traffic in alcoholic liquors as a drink, and that THE HOMES OF AMERICA, which are the citadels of patriotism, purity and happiness, have no enemy so relentless as the American Saloon:

Therefore, as citizens of the United States, irrespective of SEX, SECT OR SECTION, but having deeply at heart the PROTECTION OF OUR HOMES, we do hereby respectfully and earnestly petition you, to advocate and to adopt such measures as are requisite to the end that prohibition of the importation, exportation, manufacture and sale of alcoholic beverages may become an integral part of the NATIONAL CONSTITUTION.

[SIGNERS WILL PLEASE NOTICE that in presenting this Memorial to the National Political Conventions the following addition will be made:

"AND THAT YOUR PARTY CANDIDATE SHALL BE BY CHARACTER AND PUBLIC PLEDGE COMMITTED TO A NATIONAL CONSTITUTIONAL PROHIBITORY AMENDMENT."]

Methods of Circulating the Petition.

These will not be experimental, but have come to us as the result of long experience. Fortunately we know the best, most vivid, most successful methods. The great campaigns of Iowa, Ohio, Illinois and several eastern states have given us invaluable schooling. We know

First. That this is EVERY BODY'S WAR, and we must enlist all temperance societies, all churches, so far as possible, all zealous and discreet individuals. We must ignore all slights and criticisms, remembering only our sacred cause, and clasping loyal hands with all who favor that.

Second. That the pastors of the land will be our almost universal allies, if gently and courteously approached. They will present our petition in church and prayer-meeting as a part of their practical Christian work. They will preach in its favor and lift the whole movement to the high plane of spiritual power.

Third. That the press will give brief, pointed paragraphs, news items, and, in many cases, articles and editorials, if kindly asked to do so; and that we must keep the matter steadily before the people by this most persuasive method of influence.

Fourth. That it will not do to rely on any but the most systematic plans, both in the public audience and in the house-to-house visitation. The latter must be conducted by carefully arranged districts, not too large, and in the former we must not simply invite the audience to sign, but must furnish slips to each pew, placing them in the hands of the person seated in the end of that pew (or, if in a church, distributing them in the hymn book racks before the meeting). Then, the petition having been distinctly read from the platform, let the signatures be given (names being written in full, so that ladies' names can be readily distinguished from those of gentlemen), and these slips collected at the close of the meeting and sent to Frances E. Willard, 16 East 14th street, New York, where they will be pasted on the interminable yard-wide strip of cloth which is to furnish the substantial foundation of the entire petition. Every temperance speaker will be supplied with the petition and will we hope offer it in the thousands of meetings to be held, not only for this especial object, but the general cause. All signatures from any locality must come with a responsible certificate that they are genuine and in no case repeated. The names will be arranged by states, voters being in the first column.

A great deal depends upon the pleasing manner, the tact, the intelligence of the one seeking to gain names to the petition. An apathetic person, one that easily antagonizes others, or one ignorant of the subject of the petition, will only injure the cause.

In large places it may be well to secure consecutively, so far as possible, the names of certain classes of persons, and those in the same profession. For example: Get the names of the city officials, then ministers, lawyers, merchants, and so on.

Do not fail to circulate petitions at the close of mass meetings. The labor of days may thus be done in a few minutes. The largest audience need not be delayed more than ten minutes for this work if it be systematically planned.

Be sure to have the audience well entertained with music or animated talking while the petitions are being circulated, so that the people may not become restless. Dr. Rankin's Anthem for the W. C. T. U. is admirable. Send to office of The Union Signal, 161 LaSalle street, Chicago.

Ladies should write their own first names instead of their husbands'.

EXPLANATION OF THE

Memorial of the American Home for Protection Against the American Saloon.

The year 1884 will witness the presentation of a petition bearing, as we hope one million names. No movement less pervasive than the one set in motion by the Woman's Temperance Crusade could have made such a petition possible. No organization less devoted and intelligent than the W. C. T. U. would have ventured upon so vast an undertaking. No other work should outrank this until it is accomplished, for no other so clearly demonstrates the controlling animus of the National W. C. T. U., silences the criticisms of its friends and scatters confusion into the ranks of the common enemy.

I. What is the Petition?

1. It asks congress for an amendment to the constitution of the United States, prohibiting the importation and exportation, manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors as a drink.

2. It asks each of the party conventions that meet in 1884 to nominate candidates pledged to this principle for the presidency and vice presidency of the nation, and to put into its platform a plank declaring in favor of this measure.

3. It will contain the names and residences of at least one million men and women, and will be presented by a delegation from the National W. C. T. U. to the various party conventions this spring and to congress next fall.

II. Why is the petition?

It is because the decisive hour has come. Ten years of quiet, faithful work by women added to the aroused zeal of the pulpit and the growing earnestness of temperance men have resulted in such a volume of educated public sentiment as to day holds the balance of power. Sectional strife is buried beyond the power of partisans to effect its resurrection; the internal revenue from the liquor traffic lies in the national treasury, a surplus that embarrasses good men and tempts the cupidity of bad among our politicians; and no living issue of our time outranks the question, "How shall we control the liquor traffic?" These facts are fingers on the dial plate of time, showing that God's clock is about to strike the hour of doom for the legalized liquor traffic in our Christian republic. But our forces must have a standard around which to rally; a focus for the scattered rays of public sentiment, and the great petition supplies this need. Beside all this, its reflex influence as an educational force upon our people will be of immeasurable value. It will create or confirm the arrest of thought in a million heads and the arrest of conviction in a million hearts. It will be in effect, a muster roll for our army and those who circulate it will be virtually recruiting officers in everybody's war. Their words of sweet reasonableness uttered in a million ears will mightily augment the sum total of temperance influence. The Gatling gun of pulpit, press and platform, sending out our many side argument and loving plea, will gain incalculably in directness of aim and force of impression from the clear cut issue furnished by the great petition. Nor will our work prove to have been love's labor lost in the great councils to which it is addressed. Nothing within the scope of our possibilities could be so influential and commanding. What one million of the most intelligent and forceful adults in this nation ask for, over their own signatures, will not long be disregarded or denied by their representatives. This petition will be the beginning of the end. Its undoubted sequel will be, ere many years are past, an outlawed—not an annihilated—liquor traffic. And it is well worthy the honest hard work of our noble W. C. T. U. bands, both north and south, east and west, to help make the saloon an outlaw, even as we shall by God's blessing added to our educational work, make the drinking habit a social pariah, an Ishmaelite banished from all reputable homes.

The petition will be presented by a delegation of our leading women, representing all sections and all creeds to the republican, democratic, greenback and prohibition home-protection parties in their national conventions to be called this spring for the purpose of selecting candidates for president of the United States. It will ask distinct recognition of constitutional prohibition in the party platforms. Itself utterly non-partisan it will come as the voice of men and women who believe that protection for the homes of America from the cruelty and crime of the American saloon, is the paramount demand of our time. When congress assembles, directly after the election of the new president, the same request will be repeated, (our petition being in duplicate). The political caldron will have quieted down after the seething of a presidential campaign, and in the following four years the temperance reform will make grand strides toward victory. How inspiring the thought that though not ourselves part of the government, we women can so vitally influence its action through the lever of petition—a weapon won for us by hard parliamentary fighting in years long past, when conservative minds combatted the innovation by the same arguments they now bring forward against giving us the ballot.

"The crisis presses on us,
Face to face with us it stands,
With its solemn lips of question
Like the Sphinx of Egypt's land;
To-day we fashion destiny,
Our web of fate we spin;
Today, for all hereafter, choose we holiness or sin.
Even now, from starry, Gerizim, or Ebal's starry crown,
We call the dews of blessing or the bolts of cursing down:
By all for which the martyrs bore their agony of shame,
By all the warning words of truth with which the prophets came,
By the future that's before us,
By all the hopes that cast
Their faint and trembling beams across the blackness of the past,
And in the Sacred name of Him, who for earth's freedom died.
O ye people, O my brothers, let us choose the righteous side."

N. B. The seal of the National W. C. T. U. is stamped upon our "voter's pledge." It was designed by the gifted New York artist, Miss Mary A. Lathbury and is intended to symbolize our national motto, "For God, and home and native land," by the cross, the mother and child and the national flag. It bears the pine as an emblem for the north and the palm for the south, also the date of the Crusade's origin and monogram of the W. C. T. U., the Crusade's organized form, while shining down from the heaven of our hope, is the Star of Bethlehem with its conquering message of "Peace on earth good will to men."

Note.—Copies of this pledge, with the seal of the National W. C. T. U. as here given, will be sent free to local Unions from Headquarters. Apply to Mrs. C. B. Buell, 16 East 14th street, New York.

The Union Signal

OFFICIAL ORGAN OF THE WOMAN'S NATIONAL CHRISTIAN TEMPERANCE UNION.

"Thou hast given a banner to them that fear Thee; that it may be displayed because of the Truth; that Thy beloved may be delivered."

VOL. X.—NO. 14. CHICAGO, APRIL 3, 1884. $1 75 PER YEAR.

THE supreme court of Illinois has affirmed the validity of the $103 license ordinance enacted three months ahead of the efficiency of the high license law for the purpose of saving the four thousand saloonists of Chicago something like a million and a half dollars. The ordinance was for one year only, consequently all such licenses have now expired and the state license law must come into effect. We wait for results.

THE Dominion of Canada is rapidly prohibitng the liquor traffic. Estimating by counties, we find two thirds of Nova Scotia, five sevenths of New Brunswick, two fifths of Manitoba, and all of Prince Edward Island, have come under the the operation of the Scott act. One county in Ontario has adopted the law and nine others are agitating towards its adoption. Quebec is entirely behind in the matter, but such effort as is making across the border, in the contiguous provinces, will surely prove contagious.

THE New Jersey legislature follows its great neighbor, the Empire state, in withholding from the people the opportunity of voting the liquor traffic out of the state. The plea of the "bad majority" was that no minority ought to have the power to thrust the responsibility of choice upon the people, whereupon the clear headed superintendent of legislative work in the New Jersey W. C. T. U., asks the pertinent question. "If this be so, by what logic do our legislators insist that the minority can thrust their saloons on the people?

THE citizens of Pittsfield, New Hampshire, finding that there were three or more places in the town where spirituous and intoxicating liquors were sold contrary to the general laws of the state, resolved in annual town meeting assembled, that the town raise and appropriate the sum of three hundred dollars to prosecute and bring to justice all offenders. When the "town meeting" speaks like this, a better work is done than even citizens' leagues can do, better because the work rests in its rightful place, on the shoulders of the officials.

THE bill to secure a second extension of the bonded period was defeated in congress last week. The vote seems far more non-partisan than the country may have supposed,ninety-five democrats and eighty-eight republicans declaring against granting any further privileges to a traffic which deliberately overstocks the market with disease, pauperism, and crime. An effort is to be made to consolidate the customs and internal revenue branches of national income in one tax department, so affording to whisky the respectability of legitimate and necessary imports, and in other ways to lend governmental aid and comfort to the business. This will hardly be a successful one under the present state of the congressional mind, and does not deserve to be, as it is a part of the "refuge of lies" into which the liquor traffic runs whenever pressed.

IN an excellent temperance speech which we were privileged to hear, Judge Glenn, of the circuit court of the thirteenth judicial district, gave the following facts illustrative of the limitations of "personal liberty:" Some two years since, small-pox broke out in a small town in Mercer county, in this state. A few alert inhabitants proposing to restrict its ravages in every possible way, constituted themselves a board of health and issued an order requiring men, women and children to keep within their own borders for fourteen days. No ordinance of the village, no statute book of the state authorized such a proceeding, but the public safety required it, and it was carried out to the letter, and the extinction of the disease, with one exception. One man ventured out from his own door to attend to his store or other business. He was arrested and fined, and on appealing for redress to the circuit and state courts, was beaten, though no written law could be found to sustain the action of the impromptu board of health; the courts taking the ground that the demands of public safety must in the nature of the case, be the supreme law. The liberty of the subject must be second to the safety of the subject.

A FEW days since, in a certain nameless locality, a group of W. C. T. U. women were discussing arrangements for a lecture by ex-Governor St. John. One said, "Let us have the Rev. Dr. So-and-so introduce him." Another suggested the president of the Citizen's League. And so on around the circle the counsel varied, till one lady, a visitor said, "Is not this lecture arranged and paid for by the Woman's Christian Temperance Union?" The answer was affirmative, when she added, "Then, my sisters, I think you should have charge of it yourselves."

"What, sit on the platform and introduce the speaker!" chimed half the circle with scores of exclamation points bristling at the end of the sentence. "Yes, do it all yourselves," returned the visitor, more waywised than her sisters in effective W. C. T. U. arrangements. "You owe it to the community which supports your work to let them know just what you are doing with their money. You owe it to your society and the great national chain in which it forms a link, to dignify that society in every way possible in order to its larger usefulness. You owe it to yourselves and your own efforts to properly represent and endorse them—and as for your timidity and desire to shrink away from public notice, let me tell you that the seat of true humility is often on the platform."

Such words deserved to conquer and they did. No one knows their truth better than the live W. C. T. U. worker, and the live worker, the wise visitor in the above instance was—the name may be told in order to give greater force to her counsel—Mrs. T. B. Carse, the successful president of the Central Union of Chicago.

IN the matter of local elections this spring, there never was a more widespread determination to secure good men for office—men who will be committed by well known character as well as public pledge, to the enforcement of law. The temperance leaven that has been working for years below the surface, is bubbling up now in a merry ferment. All things come to him who works and waits.

It is a singular feature, in this contest between the supreme good and the semi-respectable evil, that so many good men ask of the temperance candidates so much more than of those on the other side. For instance, the temperance candidate must be popular, must be influential, must be dignified, must be successful in business, must be cool, shrewd and virtuous all at once, whereas the man of license, or loose regulation and enforcement, may be a drinking man, may be known as affiliating with the law breaking classes, may have been notably unsuccessful in business, and yet successfully court the votes of men who truly if not intelligently love the public interests, but who would rather oppose incoming virtue than be found in unpopular ranks. Look out for such men. Fill their places in the ranks as you surely can by hard work, by beating out from their places of retirement the quiet but selfish citizens who fear to lose the sale of a yard of calico, or a pound of sugar by leaving their places of business long enough to vote or influence others to vote. The country towns and cities have it in their power this month to make and crystallize sentiment enough to overrule the lawlessness of cities and make peace in riot ruined homes. Every effort made for truth helps every other effort. Enough ripples make the wave.

ONE WOMAN'S QUESTION.

BY MRS. HELEN M. COOKE.

Dear Union Signal:—This honest thought of a woman patriot will be welcomed by your readers I am sure. Its author is a gifted New York journalist and chairman of the committee on journalism in "Sorosis." Our Mrs. Buell secured for us the first publication of this poem, having heard it read at the recent Sorosis annual dinner at Delmonico's. Yours ever,

Frances E. Willard.

I sat and watched the flags today,
Some fluttered near, some far away;
I saw them shrink and cling, as if
They could not float for weight of grief;
And then, the soothing April wind
Just kissed their hems with touch so kind,
They floated out, and I could see
They all were hung half-mast! "Ah me,
Some man is gone! Never," I said,
"Were flags half-mast for woman dead."

And why? Oh world, I ask you why
That flag up there in the blue sky,
That floats half-mast for men, who have,
Perchance, no laurels for their grave,
The flag for which my grandsires died,
Which was my honored mother's pride,
That gives its pledge of grief today,
Should not when I shall pass away,
My work well done, my prayers all said,
Why not half-mast when I am dead?

As soon as life's affections move
Oh does not woman learn to love
Each fold and stripe, and every star
That symbols liberty, not war?
The flag for which the sons she gave
Have marched unflinching to the grave,
That hung half-mast when life had fled,
Yet ne'er would droop o'er her if dead?

If I fought battles all my life
With sin and wrong and human strife,
And gained my victories, great and grand,
As any soldier in the land;
Or, taught the lowly how to live;
Gave to the poor all I could give;
Gave to life's wounded ones the wine
From the great healing Fount Divine;
And turned the evil into good,
Blessing the world's great brotherhood
With deeds of hand, or heart, or pen,
Of suffering, dying even—like men,
No starry flag would float o'erhead
Half-mast that I was lying dead!

And yet I love that flag so well,
I love to watch its rise and swell
Like a proud bird whose tireless wings
Could soar through cloudland as he sings
The song of Freedom with his might,
The song of Justice, Hope and Right.
I watch its graceful rise and fall
In the soft air and think of all
The women who have won a name
Immortal in the world of fame;
That brighten history's treasured page,
The true of earth, the pure, the sage,
The gentle ones, the singers sweet,
The martyrs with their bleeding feet;
Yet had I yielded all I prized,
And even life had sacrificed,
And my poor name had led them all
No flag half-mast would rise and fall
In the free heavens overhead,
That I was hushed and still and dead.

THE DELUSION OF HIGH LICENSE.

BY THE REV. HERRICK JOHNSON, D.D.

Prohibition is coming. And it is coming to stay. Thirty years of its thundering up in Maine have not been wholly on deaf ears. Men all over this land have listened, and have believed. Thirty years ago prohibition was an enthusiasm sweeping over many states. Today it is a conviction, getting rooted in many states. "The day has arrived," said Joseph Cook the other day in Boston, "when the two strongest passions of the Anglo Saxon, love of liberty and love of home, are to be locked around the neck of the liquor trade, and the latter broken once and forever." He might have mentioned two other passions, one lower and one higher, that are to have a hand in the conflict; the love of money, and the love of right. Property and conscience are to take this evil by the throat, as well as liberty and home. The traffic has come to be a fearful assault on property. It compels millions now for tribute every year. And property will not stand that forever. And higher and mightier than property, higher and mightier than liberty and home, is conscience. Get that roused, get the public mind once seized with the imperious grip of an ought, and the dram shop is doomed.

Yet now, thrust right in the way of our march to prohibition, is a new device. It is a sort of indeterminate nondescript or intermediate somewhat, a tertium quid called high license! It is a measure undoubtedly honestly advocated by a few as a step toward prohibition. Undoubtedly honestly advocated by others as the best thing attainable in the circumstances. And by still others undoubtedly as a bar to prohibition. Some good temperance men accept it as a substitute for something worse. Some liquor men accept it in dread of something worse. And no wonder it attracts such strange bed-fellows. It's a child of compromise—a Mr. Facing-both-ways; neither one thing nor the other. High license may be a tub thrown to the whale; but which whale! The biggest half of it—"license"—looks as if it meant the saloon whale. But the other section of the tub—"high"—looks like a squint to the temperance whale.

Honestly but mistakenly supposed by some to be a measure of genuine reform, I am prepared deliberately to pronounce it a miserable and mischievous device, that will put some additional dollars into the treasury, but turn to ashes every other hope of good from its operation.

There are five things—five indubitable things—that make high license, as a remedy for the evils with which we are cursed by the traffic in strong drink, a delusion and a sham.

1. The first is that high license gilds the traffic with a certain air of respectability. And behind gilded vice the most danger lurks. The more outwardly respectable you make the saloon the worse you make it. The assault upon morals and manhood is then subtle, insidious, treacherous. It is not your open, outrageous, infamous sinners that do the most harm. A blatant boasting Ingersoll is far less potent for mischief than a wily and ingenious sceptic wearing the guise of Christianity only to betray it. So it is not the besotted and loathsome drunkard, swinging from his drinks to the gutter, and crawling from the gutter back again to his drinks, who tempts wayward feet to the folly and filth of intoxication. The saloons that keep up appearances, that put on a pretence of virtue, that claim to be decent in conduct and law-abiding—it is these that play the mischief with our young men.

High license tends to give them the guise of respectability. Five hundred, or one thousand dollars paid to the government for the privilege of doing a certain thing, gives to the one doing it a kind of dignity, and inevitably stamps the thing done as business of some considerably increased importance and worth. High license may possibly, though only temporarily, wipe out a few low doggeries. But it gilds the saloons it authorizes. It gives them gloss and outward decency. Not one inherent evil of the traffic is smitten by it. On the contrary it places over the whole brood of evils a broader brand of legitimacy. And painting vice, we all know, is bad business. To give respectability to an iniquitous thing is to buttress it more securely. Reform by that road is down hill. Revenue gotten on such terms—the blood of duped and betrayed victims will cry from the ground against it.

2. My second point is that high license induces the saloonkeepers to resort to other evils to make good their loss by it. They are going to get back their license fee. That thousand dollars must come back into their till. They have not gone into this business on philanthropic principles, for the good of society. They will therefore adulterate their liquors. They will vitiate their stock. Ah, if they would only water it—literally, water it! But water is the last thing they or their patrons want in it. There is no sting in water. Nothing to bring the drinker back to his glass. So they ply the stock with cheap drugs. They swell its dimensions. They make its bulk large by their vile decoctions. And it finds its way down men's throats at ten cents a glass, smooth and pleasant to the sense, only to prove at last the very poison of death, often making of men physical and moral wrecks; shattering nerves stealing away brains and deadening conscience.

But this is not all. Under the pressure of high license, and to make the establishment pay back that large fee, saloon keepers are tempted to introduce other features, to marshall other forms of vice, and to link gambling and harlotry with liquor selling so as to swell the receipts.

And this is no wild guess or foolish outburst of temperance fanatics. It is the frank statement of our enemies, and out of their own mouths shall they be condemned. Last autumn the state protective liquor association of Illinois held its annual meeting at Quincy. And the report of the executive committee boldly charged that there were "men in the traffic with whom the sale of liquors is only a blind for the gambling houses and houses of prostitution, and who did not hesitate to advocate high license in the hope of ruining the poor but decent saloon keepers, and thereby attracting custom to their own establishments." If men will not hesitate to advocate high license on that ground, men will not hesitate to garnish their saloons with games and lewd women to make high license pay. Carrying up the license fee, therefore, may gild with an outside respectability, while inside the way is often made twofold more a way of hell.

3. My third point is that high license leaves the fountain untouched while trying to dam up some streams. The evils of this traffic that so curse society and home do not commonly start in the vile, disgusting dens where there is only raggedness and filth. They are born farther up. Suppose you shut a few of the low dram shops. They will inevitably be opened again. The wash of the upper saloons must go somewhere. The respectable varieties need the low groggeries to take care of their cast-off rubbish. For this reason you won't find them troubling each other much, because perchance, selling without license. Such talk is sheer nonsense. The poor doomed victims of drink, robbed of their manhood and decency, if they step down hill must find the saloon down hill. They will find it. That stream of descending lust and filth must have an outlet. If you would stop it you must go to the top and break up the fountain. Prohibition is the word, not license. You cannot trust men with this thing any more than you can trust them with dangerous explosives. Prohibition is ever strengthening its own restrictions. License of every kind, low or high, is ever weakening its own restrictions. Prohibition thunders "No," to every evil of the traffic. License keeps the door open for all the evils to enter in, and issues a kind of standing invitation to them. Prohibition tends to victory by its enforced denial. License tends to defeat by its legalized indulgence. License is getting rid of the evils of hydrophobia by cutting off the tail of the mad dog somewhere along its bushy end. Prohibition is getting rid of those evils by cutting the tail off just behind the dog's ears.

4. My fourth point is that high license is a failure in practice. It increases revenue, but it does not lessen saloons, nor change their real character. It puts more dollars into city and county treasuries, but it does not smite and destroy the dreadful evils of traffic in strong drink. Men are sometimes content with it because it helps pay taxes. But does that make it a success? Here is the logical process. Grog shops confessedly make criminals. Criminals necessitate police. Police cost money. High license makes the grog shops pay the money. In that vicious circle crime is made its own successor. It says to the saloon keepers, "Go on perpetuating crime and manufacturing criminals, but pay for it." I appeal to any intelligent judgment if that is not bad citizenship and bad morals. If that is all of success there is in high license I brand it as a stupendous failure. Is that all its success? I know no other; I have yet to hear of any moral or social transformation it has brought about.

On the other hand the proofs of failure are signal. I give but two, the one covering a city and the other a state. The city is Des Moines, Iowa, and the facts are vouched for by a gentleman over his own signature as "taken from the records of the city clerk." In 1871, with the license fee $150 there were twelve saloons. In 1872, with license at $200 there were twenty-five saloons. In 1880, with license at $250 there were forty-nine saloons. And in 1882, with license at $1,000 there were sixty saloons. The state referred to is Nebraska, where prohibition is the general state law, but high license is optional and the local exception. The fee is $1,000. The law was enacted in 1881. In 1882 the records showed 226 less saloons, but in 1883 the records showed a gain of fifty-nine. The Hon. H. W. Hardy, ex-mayor of Lincoln, Neb., and the father of the high license idea, testifies: "There has been no improvement in our saloons." "Gambling and prostitution go hand in hand." "High license has done nothing toward waking up temperance sentiment." "Saloon keepers violate the law just as they always have." John B. Finch, prominent in the advocacy of the law, and an ardent temperance man, testifies: "I was a friend of the law at its birth. I now know I was terribly mistaken in my theories." "Many of the delusions urged in defense of high license have been exploded by the trial of the law."

Contrast now these statements and figures with those recently published as to the success of prohibition in Kansas. They were gathered by James A. Troutman, of Topeka. He wrote to every county attorney and superintendent and police judge in the state. Reports were received from sixty-six out of eighty-one counties. And these reports, be it remembered, were made by state officers, not by temperance partisans. In these sixty-six counties the number of saloons has been reduced, since May 1, 1881, when the prohibitory law took effect, from 708 to 313, of which latter number more than half are in Leavenworth. During this time the population has increased twelve per cent. In forty-one counties there is not one saloon. The fines have amounted to $95,000 and eighty-one saloon keepers have been imprisoned their imprisonment aggregating eleven years, five months and nineteen days. In fifty-one counties the reports all agree that prohibition sentiment is growing stronger. In seven counties it is reported as growing weaker; and in eight as at a stand still. Look on these two pictures and judge ye, does high license restrict? Does not prohibition prohibit?

It is said, high license will at least shut up the unlicensed saloons; for those who have paid so heavily for their license will prosecute in self-defence. This is the absurdest of fallacies. Here are three good reasons why: First, the house of the liquor dealer will not divide against itself. Secondly, the higher liquor dealers are mostly violaters of the law themselves. Many of them sell to drunkards; sell to minors; sell on Sundays. They live in glass houses, and they will not throw stones. Thirdly, they need these low saloons to take their refuse. They want these stations down hill, to get their own victims out of the way when they are done with them. The brotherhood is too close. Saloon keepers will not turn prohibitionists, as against their own clan.

5. The fifth and final point is that license, whether high or low, is wrong in principle. This objection to the system is radical and fundamental. It goes to the root of the whole matter. If once persuaded that it is well taken, it end all advocacy or connivance on the part of him of a good conscience.

The ground upon which the objection is based is this: The actual saloon is an iniquity. The evils directly traceable to it, and that inevitably in greater or less degree flow out of it, whenever and wherever opened, are absolutely appalling. These evils affect public order, public health, public decency: they increase taxes, imperil property, endanger life. They are by confession the prolific source of crime, poverty, orphanage, disease, death. They are open, public, notorious, civic and social. There is no such assault on health, on life, on property, on liberty, on society, on the home, as that which comes from the liquor traffic. There is not one solitary privilege that can be afforded the dram seller consistent with the public good. The saloon exists as a moral abomination.

Now the government, in issuing its license, virtually says, and without any possibility of question as to its meaning, "Pay me $500 and for one year you may proceed with that moral abomination. You may open a saloon and deal out strong drink, notwithstanding the fact that the saloon in any community is the invariable precursor and cause of social and moral blight and curse." The government thus lends its high sanction to the traffic, gives it a legal status, throws about it its sacred shield, and stamps it with a legitimacy as real as if it were the most innocent and beneficent business of life.

For the government to do that thing, whether for five dollars, or five hundred dollars, or five thousand dollars, is a moral wrong! Governments, like individuals, must forevermore do right. Permits to pursue the liquor traffic are permits to make inroads on almost every interest of life. License to sell intoxicating drink carries with it, not only liquor-selling, but the known and inevitable consequences of liquor-selling. This law of responsibility is true of the individual. It is just as true of the state.

But it is denied by some good men that license carries this fearful implication. It is held by them that license is simply in the nature of a tax, and is, so far as it goes, restrictive and prohibitory, giving no sanction and implying no approval.

Consult any legal authority and see how this befogs definition and challenges common sense. Bouvier defines license: "A right given by some competent authority to do an act which, without such authority, would be illegal." He defines tax: "A contribution imposed by government on individuals for the service of the state." Now mark the unmistakable distinctions here made. License is "a right given"; tax is "a contribution imposed." License implies a privilege. Tax implies an obligation. License is a permission. Tax is a command. License gives legal status. Tax gives nothing, but requires. License is for regulation. Tax is for revenue. The very essence of license is a permit to do. The license fee is simply an incident of regulation, and does not affect the nature of license at all. Whether the fee be five hundred dollars or five dollars, or not a dollar, or not a cent, the act is the same, viz., governmental permission and sanction to do a certain thing. No quibble of words can change this simple axiomatic truth. Tying Esau's hair to Jacob's hands and neck does not change Jacob's voice. The fundamental feature of license abides, whether with high fee, or low fee, or no fee.

If license carries no sanction, but is only prohibitive, then why not license prostitution? "No," say the good men who are confounding things that differ. "No: that is a sin per se." But what difference does it make whether prostitution is a sin per se or a sin per circumstance, if the licensing it is simply in the nature of a tax, and merely restrictive? If the position of these men is correct, then the licensing of prostitution carries no sanction, and their running to shelter under "sin per se" is blank cowardice and logical suicide. If their position is not correct, then licensing the drink shop is formal official investment of the drink shop with full right to open its doors and proceed with its work of ruin. One horn of the dilemma or the other, gentlemen. There is no alternative, save to wash hands clean and forever of the whole business of license.

I know the fallacies with which honest and conscientious men strangely delude themselves here. They get their chief expression in this concentrated piece of wisdom, viz., that half a loaf is better than none at all. But is a half loaf better than no bread at all? If in getting the half loaf I must compromise with an iniquity, then let the bread go! It is better to perish with hunger than to do a wrong. If in getting a few saloons closed, I must sanction the saloon business by advocating license, high or low, then let my tongue cleave to the roof of my mouth before it speak approval. I must not do evil that good may come.

Listen now to some of the misleading analogies by which good men seek to prop their judgment in this case: "If I have five children sick with some malignant fever, I will save three if I can't save all." Yes, but that father will do his utmost to the very last to save all. He wont go into the license business with death. He will attempt to save each child with the same fidelity and persistence with which he tries to save every other child. Anything short of that would be criminal. Now let him strive to shut all the saloons just as persistently as he would strive to save all his children, and he is a prohibitionist. Prohibition seeks to do just that and only that.

"But are not fifteen saloons better than twenty?" Let us see. Are fifteen murders better than twenty? Certainly not, if in lessening the number by five, the government must issue its formal license to commit the fifteen!

"But this kind of argument in the old slave-holding days would have made it wrong at the south to advocate a law prohibiting the sale of husbands from their wives, or any other cruel feature of slavery." Not at all. Such a law would not have been a provision for licensing slave-holding: but a provision for stopping one of its wrongs. Any honest opposer of slavery living in the south could have advocated such a law with a good conscience. But suppose the question had been, "Shall the state issue annual licenses to men to hold slaves, it being provided in the license that they shall not sell husbands away from wives? Or, to make the case exactly parallel, it being provided that the license fee shall be $500? You see the difference, and you see the fallacy.

It is the license feature in this business—the giving the legal right to do a moral wrong—that commands the protest of many good men, and which we believe will command the protest of millions more before the discussion is through. The half-loaf-better-than-no-bread theory goes to pieces against this rock of principle.

"But do not the scriptures speak of times of ignorance that God winked at, or overlooked? Did not Moses suffer divorce because of the hardness of the people's hearts? Were not slavery, polygamy and the taking of human life, divinely tolerated or regulated?" Yes. But the dim twilight of that distant past is not the high noon of today. The "times of that ignorance" are not the times of this knowledge. A fifteenth century conscience before Christ cannot justify a nineteenth century conscience after Christ. For a blinded Israelite to be allowed to do what he thought right, is no reason why an intelligent Christian should do today what he thinks wrong.

It is the action of a man who acknowledges the evil and curse of this saloon business that we are discussing. Shall he by voice and vote favor a law licensing the drink shop when he knows the drink shop is everywhere and always the prolific source of moral abominations? To put us under the toleration of that distant, blind, groping patriarchal age, would justify our regulating and licensing Mormon polygamy and letting back southern slavery. Jacob could not have had our light, and at the same time both kept his wives and a good conscience.

Emerson voiced a universal truth in saying, "Men are strong in proportion to their convictions." The stomach and the pocket do not rule the world. Ideas are more than all monies and appetites and armies and governments. Let us get the public mind once seized with some definite and intense convictions on this liquor question, get it thrust through with light and truth and fact, and there is not a power of legislative bribery, or a possibility of political combination, or enough bulking of capital, in any liquor league on earth, to stand against it.

The supreme business of the hour, therefore, is to make men see the truth about the dram shop; that there is no possibility of just compromise with it; that it is evil and only evil, and that continually; that licensing it is bad policy and bad morality. If men say, "The state is not ready for prohibition," let the answer be, "We mean to make it ready." Meanwhile, let us do what in us lies to enforce every prohibitory feature of the license laws. Inflexibly opposed to the adoption of any law that licenses, let us be inflexibly determined to enforce all legal restraints upon the licensed.

All honor to the Citizen's Leagues. It is true we believe they are trying to stop streams instead of fountains. But they are fighting some sore evils, and we will work with them. We are not visionaries. Yet nevertheless and none the less we are held by behest of conscience and every interest of homes and hearts to prohibition, and for that and that only will we labor and pray.

SPRING AND SUMMER FLOWER PARTIES.

UNDER THE AUSPICES OF YOUNG WOMEN'S CHRISTIAN TEMPERANCE UNIONS AND OTHER YOUNG PEOPLE'S ASSOCIATIONS.

Dear Union Signal:—The enclosed rhymes about flowers were used at a valentine party given in my home to the young people of my church, and as they afford innocent amusement combined with some temperance hints I have thought they might be of service in the sociables of the Y. W. C. T. U. during the spring and in the lawn parties of the summer, as a brief episode in the exercises. Let a supply of flowers be obtained by the managers (using scrap book flowers for any referred to in the following list of which real ones can not be obtained) and have the flowers numbered by a tag or otherwise in accordance with the list following. Let one of these flowers be given to every gentleman and lady of the party except the one who has prepared herself to read the Sybyl's rhymes. If there are more people than there are different flowers, let each kind of flower be given to two or three or more. When all is prepared the Sybyl announces herself as ready to tell each one's fortune by the flower he holds, and calls out, "No. 1." All who have flower number one hold it high aloft while the Sybyl reads the first rhyme, and so on to the end.

Another interesting feature for such a gathering would be the reading or repeating of brief quotations about flowers from Scripture and literature, a collection of such having been prepared on small slips of paper and distributed to those who had not provided themselves. Of course a flower stand for the sale of flowers could be added whenever revenue was an object of the gathering.

Cordially yours, Wilbur F. Crafts.

49. Lilac, (for Gentleman.)
A Lilac,—first "emotions of love,"—
Oh how gushingly they move!
Large and abundant they seem to prove;
Let the one you gush on gush right back,
And your love suffer nor lie nor lack.

50. Raspberry, (for Lady.)
The Raspberry tells of remorse,
Which means you are sorry of course,
That you said you'd not marry the man,
And want him to ask you again.

51. Primrose, (for Lady.)
"A Primrose by the river's brim,"
A Primrose,—only—to what "him?"

52. Wild rose, (for lady.)
So you're "a Rose, a fickle wild Rose,"
That shines for all and "everybody knows."

53. Jonquil, (for Lady.)
The Jonquil says you will Marry some John of the quill,
Some writer of nonsense and news,
Or the quill may stand for a goose.

54. Honeysuckle, (for Lady.)
A Honeysuckle, not for bees but beaus,
But you must not suppose
They don't also visit the rose,
They are "honey"-ing every hour
At every opening flower.

55. Bleeding-heart, (for Gentleman.)
Who made your loving heart bleed?
Whose "No," gave your soul such a pain?
"If at first you do not succeed,"
There are more fish, so try, try again.

THE LOUISIANA CONVENTION.

Dear Union Signal:—I presume the Louisiana convention doings have all been reported to you, as our dear Hannah sat "the chiel amang us takin' notes" all the time. I do not know what kind of a reporter she makes, I do not believe she makes a good one however; for it would just be too discouraging to the rest of us for her to have that gift, in addition to all the others? Did she tell you what a comfort she was to us all? And how, in our impulsive southern way, we kept telling her so, right to her face, because we could not help it? If she did not, I am that far ahead of her reporting things as they were, for it was so, and I believe hundreds of doubting, fainting ones, who were almost ready to give up, will bless God that she came south and taught her beautiful "secret of a happy life," as exemplified in her own experience.

Mrs. Mary Lowe Dickinson, was with her, but her health did not permit her to take part in our meetings, so only those of us who were privileged to meet her in the social circle, understand what we missed. She calls herself "one of my trophies," as her resolve to identify herself fully with the temperance work, was made at the South Carolina convention. You see Mrs. Editor, this simple, innocent little "fly," with the humility of all great and good insects, who never yet were known to appreciate themselves at their true value, had come to the conclusion that it would be an utter impossibility for her to fly as high, or buzz as loud as Miss Willard, Mrs. Foster, or the rest of you specimen-diptera so she had concluded not to try at all, until she came to South Carolina, and saw just an ordinary house fly, buzzing away and a whole convention seemingly interested in the noise it made. She came to the conclusion then immediately that if folks were as easy to please, as the South Carolina women seem to be, she would go right to buzzing herself. So now dear friends, this fire-fly, who like the rest of the tribe goes into eclipse sometimes, may be expected at any moment to beam out upon us, like the bright particular star it is and I shall have the consolation of knowing, if I am not myself a drummond light, I am a little match, that was used to light one. But I started to tell you something of the Louisiana convention, which has just closed, and proved a grand success.

To the W. T. C. U. of New Orleans, the lines have fallen in pleasant places. The state president, delivered her address in her own church, the pastor and officers of the church being Christian gentlemen of the broadest culture, who do all they can to aid and encourage her in the noble work in which she is engaged.

The opening services were conducted by the Rev. Dr. Landrum, of the Baptist church, and Bishop Linus Parker, of the Southern Methodist church closed them.

Reporters from the papers were present at all the meetings, and the proceedings, which sometimes filled columns, were all published. Distinguished ministers from different denominations were introduced, and encouraged us to go on in the great work in which we are engaged. The Rev. Hiram Smith D.D., editor of the Southwestern Presbyterian, said we "were doing a work men could not do, and if the labors of Christian women were withdrawn from the churches, Christian work would not only be crippled but paralyzed."

The Rev. Halsey Werlein, one of the most eloquent and gifted ministers of the city, welcomed us in the name of the clergy to New Orleans. One of the largest, and finest halls, was placed at the disposal of the ladies, free of charge, and used by them for the children's mass meetings, and it really seemed that every body was seeking an opportunity to show in their own way, their appreciation of the temperance work.

Louisiana has done nobly this year, and reported twenty times the members that they did at last convention, and as it had been my privilege to organize almost all their unions, it was a great joy to me to greet the dear women as they came to convention "bringing in the sheaves." How I listened to Mrs. Mary Read Goodale, as she reported her work done since the evening when, trembling like a leaf, she introduced me in loving, eloquent words to a large audience at the capitol of her state. She calls that her "debut." It was a coming out, not only to stay, but to work. She brought to convention the report of the colored unions of Baton Rouge, which they sent in. Mrs. Goodale, was elected corresponding secretary. Shreveport, whose noble president (true woman as she is,) Mrs. Col. Foster, who staid at home because of a threatened indisposition in the nursery, proving what we claim, that only the mothers and wives who are true to their own dear ones can feel an interest in the homes of others, or in the salvation of other mothers' boys, was represented by the vice president, Mrs. Wise,—who wanted me to "stand right by her" as she gave in her report. Of course I would, for did she not stand right up to me, and help me form the Shreveport union.

But when she began to tell of the great work they had done, and the fine reading room they had established, her eyes sparkled, and she forgot every thing, but that they had been working for the blessed Master, and trying to save some for whom the Savior died.

Trenton came up in force, and brought their auxiliaries with them. No union in the south has done more than this union. It is a band of noble workers, and their lawyer preacher, Brother Sawyer, has not his superior on the continent. He follows the great apostle to the Gentiles in "reasoning of temperance" and "helping the women," and don't lay all the stress on the fact that the Jewish rabbins "did not permit them to speak in church" in the long ago before they had 19th century training, which fitted them to do so. The social element was emphasized at this convention. Elegant lunches were provided, and served in an upper room giving the delegates an opportunity of becoming acquainted. The entire audience were invited on both days.

The evening after the convention Judge Merrick's suburban residence was thrown open, and the noble president of the Louisiana state union assisted by her corps of officers received the convention and a number of distinguished guests. Rare flowers, sweet music, choice recitations, wit, repartee, all had a place in the program and although the old family punch bowl, contained nothing stronger than iced fruit juices, the evening passed all too soon away. Rev. Dr. Gilbert, of Chicago, introduced by Miss Willard, addressed the convention and attended the reception. Miss Henrietta Moore and Mrs. Angele Davis, both of Ohio, were with us.

And now in conclusion let me give you a piece of good news about Flordia. It was my good fortune while in Jacksonville, to make my home with the widow of a literary friend I had known in the long ago, a charming home it is. Mrs. Robinson, my gentle loving hostess, is going to purchase a home for the W. C. T. U. of Jacksonville in memoriam of the loved and lost, who was a philanthropist. "Though dead in this beautiful charity he will still speak." S. F. Chapin.

HOW DOES IT WORK?

Dear Union Signal:—I would like to know what success attends efforts made by state corresponding secretaries to secure quarterly or even semi-annual reports from auxilaries. Only twelve of those due March 1, have reached me up to date, which number two more than were returned filled one year since. Our constitution requires only semi-annual returns. The experience of other secretaries would be most valuable. Does the quarterly plan ensure better results? On every occasion possible Kansas auxiliaries have been urged to "keep records of all they do and make accurate reports when called upon," with so little improvement upon the general laxity as a result. What can be done to make them realize how important is this duty?

Our cause is growing rapidly in Kansas—not numerically so much as in result. The Hutchinson secretary exultantly reports the conversion of three saloon keepers and two confirmed drunkards during a series of religious meetings held during the winter, and the serious conviction of several others of the same class. Foes are thus made allies.

The new union in Atchison has organized a Band of Hope having seventy-seven members and has raised more than $360 for local work. The liquor agitation in that city, which has caused so great an excitement and brought out the resolutions of protest against anything so new and so detrimental to the peace and well-being of the city is a natural result. The fruits of the Spirit are first pure then peaceable. We cannot be peaceable with impurity all around us.

Another new union formed in Humboldt, January 19, 1884, with fifty-nine paying members is actively engaged in antagonizing the saloon, and has already raised $250 to be used in enforcing the law. The secretary says: "We think a few days more will end saloons in our city." One conviction on eight counts was obtained in a justice court, the justice himself being opposed to it. They will now wait until the district court opens.

The Wichita Union leads in active county work. Every school district has been visited and unions formed in all, not always W. C. T. U., but when that was not practical, unions composed of both sexes. $10,000 has been raised to successfully carry on this work, and more than six hundred signatures to the pledge secured. The auxiliary at Wichita is composed of one hundred members and its president is also county president.

We are hoping that Mrs. Nelly Bayley, National Chalk Talker, will visit our state early in May and help and instruct us.

Our state president, Mrs. Laura M. Fields, has called a meeting of the executive committee of Kansas to meet in Leavenworth, April 1. May the deliberations be beneficial to our great work.

NOT FIT TO BE KISSED.

"What ails papa's mouf ? said a sweet little girl,
Her bright laugh revealing her teeth white as pearl;
"I love him and kiss him and sit on his knee.
But the kisses don't smell good when he kisses me.

"But mamma"—her eyes opened wide as she spoke—
"Do you like nasty kisses of 'bacco and smoke?
They might do for the boys, but for ladies and girls
I don't think them nice;" and she tossed her bright curls.

"Don't nobody's papa have moufs nice and clean?
With kisses like yours, mamma, that's what I mean.
I want to kiss papa, I love him so well,
But kisses don't taste good that have such a smell.

"It's nasty to smoke, and eat 'bacco and spit,
And the kisses ain't good and aint sweet—not a bit!"
And her blossom-like face wore a look of disgust
As she gave out her verdict so earnest and just.

Yes, yes, little darling! your wisdom has seen
That kisses for daughters and wives should be clean;
For kisses lose something of nectar and bliss
From mouths that are stained and unfit for a kiss.

GRANDMA'S LITTLE RED CLOAK.

BY LOUISE D. MITCHELL.

"So you want me to tell you a story, children?" Grandma Hilton asked of the eager group sitting around her. "Well, and about what shall it be? Think of something that you would like to hear, and then ask me."

"Oh! I know," little Maudie cried, as she leaned on the arm of grandma's chair, and looked up into the dear old lady's face, "tell us about the pretty red cloak in the sweet-smelling box. You know you said that you would tell us some time, and isn't this a some time, grandma dear?"

The old lady laughed, and taking off her gold-rimmed spectacles, rubbed them, and replaced them on the bridge of her nose.

"The little red cloak?" she said, when she could be heard above the noisy voices that eagerly requested the story. "O, yes; I recollect it, dears; now all sit as quietly as possible, and do not interrupt me, while I tell you all about it."

The children, including sixteen-year-old Fred, settled themselves in the most comfortable position, and prepared to enjoy the treat.

"It all happened when I was ten years old," grandma began, her needles flying out and in as she talked. "I, with a number of other little girls, went to a school just within the village, and during the hours between nine and two o'clock we studied and recited our lessons. After that we went to the woods to gather flowers, grasses and berries. In the fall we found leaves, and filled our baskets with nuts. Often we played hide-and-seek, house, and many other games; but our chiefest and most delightful pastime was when we stood upon an embankment and looked down upon the trains which were constantly rushing by. Upon the opposite side of the track ran the pretty river Glen.

My mother, who was often obliged to go to the city on business, would wave her hand and throw a kiss to us as she was borne quickly past. The embankment was much higher than the railroad, so that the two formed steps, consequently they were called the "Two steps bend," though it was known to the school-girls as the "View."

A little girl two or three years older than I went to our school, whom I am sorry to tell you I heartily despised; simply because, though ragged and poor, yet she was studious and painstaking with her lessons, while I was careless and inattentive. Therefore Mary Ryle was far above me in the classes.

She was not a pretty child, but she had the most beautiful hair I have ever seen. It hung in long silken curls below her waist and was of a bright golden color.

The morning of my tenth birthday arrived, and mother presented me with a very pretty red cashmere cloak, saying as she handed it to me, 'Don't allow your present to make you forget yourself or your lessons, darling.'

I was very proud of my cloak, which I wore when I started off to school, and so filled with admiration of it was I, that I actually forgot to return my mother's farewell kiss.

When I reached the school house the girls clustered about me, patting the cloak, admiring its bright color, and entreating to be allowed to try it on, but I shook my head, and told them that they must wait until after school.

School was finally dismissed, much to my relief, for it had been a very unsuccessful day for me. Lesson after lesson I missed, and had seen Mary Ryle march to the head of the class with such a bitter feeling in my heart that it frightened me.

However, we walked down to the 'View,' a gay and laughing group of girls, but Mary walked silently beside us. She was unusually grave that afternoon, and when we girls asked her the cause of her silence she shook her head, saying that she could not tell, excepting that she felt as if something were going to happen, she knew not what.

'It is not that at all,' I said angrily. 'You know well enough that your conscience is troubling you for going above me today, Mary Ryle.'

'Oh! no, Esther, not that,' she answered, turning quickly to me. 'I could not help it; you did not know how to spell the word and I did, and passed above you. Surely, you do not feel angry with me because of that? You will forgive me, won't you?'

'Never!' was my naughty answer, and even when I saw the tears filling her eyes my heart did not soften at all.

It took us some time to reach the 'View,' as it was a mile from the school house. At last, seated upon a rock where we could conveniently watch the cars, I willingly allowed my pretty cloak to be worn in turn by each admiring girl, with the exception of Mary Ryle.

'Won't you please let me try it on, Esther?" she asked, her eyes fastened wistfully upon me. She dearly loved pretty things, and had been loudest in her admiration of my treasure.

'You, indeed?' said I, scornfully tossing my head. 'Do you suppose that I want my pretty cloak spoiled by you?'

You see, children, I had entirely forgotten the Golden Rule, and oh! you should have seen her sorrowful face as she heard my naughty words. Grandma paused, and quickly brushed the tears from her eyes. "Poor Mary made no answer, but turning away, she gazed through the break in the trees where the cars were always visible first. My companions stood silent and ashamed of me. I deserved their scorn, dears, I knew it, then, though I was too proud to allow them to see it. Suddenly, we were startled by a scrambling, grating sound like that of a large rock dashing down the mountain.

We knelt down with one accord, and peered over the ledge, to see, with horror, a large rock landed directly in the middle of the track, while off in the distance we could hear the dull rumble of the ill-fated train as it rushed on—to what? I dared not stop to think. I could only, in my misery, picture the long train of cars rolling over and over, and into the river below.

'Oh, girls!' I gasped, a sudden, startling thought coming to me. 'It is mother's train, and she will be on it. Oh, mother, my dear, dear mother!' I covered my face with my hand, the little red cloak so recently admired hanging limp and forgotten upon my arm.

'What can be done?' the frightened girls cried. 'Must they all be killed?'

We did not answer. On came the engine. We could see the smoke streaming from its pipe.

How insensible to their fate the passengers were! Perhaps some were laughing then, whose mirth would be changed to moans and to dying cries. These thoughts flashed through my brain, while I gazed in silent despair at the engine.

Without a word, Mary Ryle sprang toward me and tore the red cloak from my arm.

The next instant we terrified girls beheld her rushing down the hill at the top of her speed to the track, while she waved aloft my red cloak, shrieking to the engineer to stop. Would he never see her? The iron monster was but fifty feet from the undaunted figure with its sunny curls.

Yes, he had seen her all along, but could not stop the engine, running at the rate of sixty miles an hour, in time to prevent it from hurling the brave girl far into the air, causing her body to fall heavily against the very embankment upon which we girls, paralyzed with fright, stood. But, children," grandma's voice faltered, "children, the girl whom I had hated, despised and wrongfully treated, had saved hundreds of passengers, and my dearly loved mother.

The long train stood motionless, and when I came in the midst of the sorrowful group around that still form, I saw my mother there.

I remember that one of the gentlemen, who was a doctor, knelt beside Mary, and gently smoothed her long, golden ringlets, all tumbled and matted with blood as they were, back from her face. He laid a hand as tenderly as a woman's upon her heart, then arose, and looked at the crowd of anxious faces about him.

'Gentlemen,' he said, trying in vain to steady his voice, 'gentlemen, the brave and noble girl is dead.'

I did not hear any more, for all was dark before me, and I became unconscious."

Once more grandma paused. Not a sound was heard save the sobs of her hearers.

The old lady took off her damp glasses, and folding her hands in her lap resumed her narrative.

"When I recovered consciousness mother was holding me in her arms, her dear face all wet with tears, and as I looked beyond her, I saw four men carrying the form of little Mary from the scene of horror.

My little red cloak was wrapped about her. Oh! how I longed to say, 'Mary, here is my cloak; keep it, and wear it forever. And oh! forgive me for my cruel words.'

It was too late. She wore my treasure, but it was too late for her to admire it.

They buried Mary, and people from far and near came to the funeral to look upon the child who had been so brave.

Upon the marble shaft was incribed, 'Mary Frances Ryle, Born Dec. 17, 1811, Died June 10, 1823. Greater love hath no man than this, that a man lay down his life for his friends.'

That is all, children," grandma said a little huskily, as she bent down and kissed Maudie's brown head resting against her lap. "I hope I didn't tire you, dears," and while the children wondered why grandma kept her face hidden, only brother Fred, sitting nearest to her, knew that it was to hide the bitter tears welling up from the repentant old heart.—Christian at Work.

ANOTHER WORD FROM MRS. BAYLEY

Dear Children:—I was in Attica, N. Y., the other day. The nice lady who entertained me has a German maid who went to the Chalk Talk entertainment and brought home with her several of her country folk, and we overheard them in the kitchen talking over all the doings of the meeting, which proved what good listeners beer-drinkers sometimes are. One remarked, "She said we drank beer innocently, many of us. Now, that was charitable. And she said it was the generous man who drank. Now, that didn't go down bad?

Afterward a Norwegian, a worthy old man, told Mrs. Mason that he had a daughter named "Mary Elizabeth," and when the story of another by that name was told in chalk, he had to cry, thinking what if that were his girl, his own dear Mary Elizabeth! Oh, these warm hearts of our foreign brothers and sisters are worth winning and the surest way I believe, is through their children.

Afterward I went over into the queen's Dominion and was welcomed there for the first time, by that indefatigable worker Minnie Phelps. I hope that the queen is as proud of this grand champion of temperance as she ought to be. We had a fine audience there, prominent among them the orphans from the Home, who sat like a body of little senators with their folded arms and uplifted eyes. It seemed to me that not one of them moved during the evening. It was a picture that will hang on memory's walls forever. Your loving friend,

Nelly H. Bayley.

CRUSADE RALLYING SONG.

BY MRS. MARY A. LEAVITT.

(Written April 18, '74.)

We are marshaling the forces
Of an army true and strong;
We are going forth to battle
'Gainst a Hydra-headed wrong;
We are marching to the music
Of the "Coronation" song;
And by this sign we'll conquer
Tho' the fight be fierce and long!

Where the bugle calls to battle
We shall go with fearless feet;
Tho' the proud may deem this service
Both for them and us unmeet:—
Keeping step to right and duty,
We shall find the pathway sweet!
And from thence, ne'er have our leaders
Called a halt, or a retreat!

From the rum fiend's poisoned arrows—
From his fiery, fated quest,
We are pledged to guard each other
And all those we love the best:—
And our battle cry is, "Forward!"
"No faltering and no rest
Till rum's flaunting, mocking ensign
Down beneath the dust is pressed!"

With hearts all aglow with pity
For our tempted ones who fall;
And with arms outstretched to rescue
Wounded friend, or foe, or all,—
We are pledged to do our utmost
To break down this tyrant's thrall!
Ne'er, "Am I my brother's keeper?"
Be our answer to God's call!

See, bright from many a hill-top
How new camp fires flash and glow!
Hear, from tented fields and valleys
New songs and victory go!
Shout answers shout, till a chorus
Breaks in impetuous flow;—
"All hail!" "What cheer?" "Lo the morning Shall dawn on a vanquished foe!"
"The east takes a tint from the glory
That the coming day shall know!"

PATHOS, POVERTY, PRIDE.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "WITHIN IRON BARS" "EDGAR WARNER," ETC.

"And yet notwithstanding all you have told me I think you are somewhat to blame."

"To blame! oh aunt! what more could I do? I have remonstrated, plead, reasoned, coaxed, and it is of no use. The dreadful end is before me night and day, I might as well at once turn the waters over the Ægeon stables as to try to save him now."

"That is just what you will have to do, and you will find it a Herculeon task. Mary rouse yourself to one more mighty effort. Please God the human temple so dreadfully polluted by the filth of the still, shall once more be made a fit habitation for the human soul."

But Mary shook her head despairingly, as she laid her pale face with it quivering lip, back against a soiled tidy on an old rickety, rocking chair. She was not a pleasing picture to look at. Her hair was twisted up in a little knob at the back of her head, her eyes had been too well acquainted with tears, but now varied from a wild hardness to sadness and despair. She was covered by an old torn delaine dress, loose at the throat, with no sign of a collar, and a something covering her feet which we will by courtesy designate a shoe.

Two dirty little children stared at the strange visitor, who called their mother, Mary, from out the half open kitchen door, but were not to be coaxed to her side. Perhaps Mrs. Blake did not make sufficient advances, for she could not check the feeling of horror at their appearance for their eyes were too large for their pinched faces, and the receding lip baring the teeth were too corpse like.

Mrs. Blake had not met her niece since a few months after her marriage. Then she had spent a few weeks with her in this handsome cottage that had been her father's last gift.

Mary was an only child, who had been motherless for years before the marriage which had taken place quietly at her father's bedside a few days before his death.

He had passed away in peace feeling that Bryant Halstead's brilliant intellect would always bring them in handsome lawyer's fees.

Could he have set down with them to their dainty dinners and have seen Bryant toss off so lightly his glass of sparkling wine, his last hours might not have been so tranquil.

Mary too would laughingly touch her cup to his as they drank to each other. But Mary was not fond of wine, and as the months passed on and her husband often grew silly after his extra glasses, or something stronger he had substituted, her fears were aroused, and she tried to remonstrate with him and finally to plead and coax and beg, but it always ended in stormy scenes, for Mary would grow indignant and he felt outraged at being interfered with, so matters grew worse after every scene, until she finally gave up attempting to sway him.

As a natural result of his course, business fled from him, old friends avoided him. Long ago Mary had withdrawn from society and her only appearance was after night, enveloped in some disguising wrap, to make the necessary purchases to keep breath in their bodies, sometimes with a few pennies given her by her husband and sometimes after a distressing parley with some second hand man, over old clothes or furniture.

In her pride she could not make known her troubles, and to screen her more effectually the front door was always locked, and the blind close drawn, while she and the children withdrew to the back of the house, which happily for them was flooded with sunshine the greater part of the day. Here she whiled away the days in idleness and weary longings, whose business was it if there was or was not any one living here? The neighbors thought there must be for they saw occasionally a shambling uncertain looking man diappear through an ornamental iron door that closed the passage way to the rear of the house, but the door swallowed him up and was locked to intruders.

It was by the merest accident that Mrs. Blake gained admittance. She had not heard from Mary for three or four years. Having business in the city that would detain her for some time, she came directly to her house, and disliking to go to a hotel unattended, she had gone to the rear of the house in hopes of gaining admittance, when Mary unexpectedly opened the door and in her astonishment forgot to close it in her face as she would have done had there been time for thought.

"Aunty Blake!"

"Mary Halstead is it you?"

They had been talking together some time when my story opened. The aunt by pointed decisive questions had wrung from Mary a true statement of the trouble—and as her eyes wandered over the room that had once been a lovely dining room, Mrs. Blake thought of it as she had seen it six years before. The bow window full of flowers; the open grate in which a bright fire glowed; the dainty ornaments on the marble mantle; the pictures and brackets on the walls and the handsome bookcase well filled with her father's choice books. She remembered that the book case door was locked and one night when they were busy talking together Bryant had asked for the key to get him a book to read, and that Mary had said pettishly.

"Oh don't get the books down Bryant, I have just got them all in orderly rows once more. You get them all at sixes and sevens when you open it."

Bryant had whistled a little and then taking up a cigar, sat puffing and cutting off the curling smoke with his little finger for a few minutes and then rising said carelessly, "I am going over to see Case a little while." She remembered just how manly and handsome he looked as he kissed his hand good bye to them at the door, and it was hard to realize the story her niece had just been telling her.

What a sad, sad change. Only little patches of color in the corners showed that the gray niches of linen and dirt had once been a handsome brussels. The flowers were gone from the windows, and although it was a chilly autumn day the open grate showed but dead coals, and the ashes over pan and floor showed the busy hands of children. The handsome book case was scratched and marred by the same childish fingers, but the books in their orderly rows, looked as if the key had been lost and never found since that evening six years ago.

Poverty! poverty! hateful poverty! Odious word. The result of the coil that tempted Eve's appetite, of the coil in the cup that "stingeth like a serpent and biteth like an adder."

"Where is Bryant, Mary?"

Mary opened her eyes in astonishment at her aunt asking the question after the recent conversation.

"I don't know. He has not been here since last evening."

"Is this the kind of a home he comes to?" Mary's cheeks flushed as she glanced round the room and then at herself.

"Why what is the use of trying to keep in order. Nobody ever comes and he doesn't care?"

"How is that? He used to be continually praising your housekeeping and your dainty costumes."

"Yes," said Mary with a sigh, "but that is long past. It is not worth while to take the trouble now for he does not notice."

"I do not understand child, when you were so careful and painstaking to have your home beautiful, how I find it in such a condition now."

"Oh but auntie, I did it for him. He loved the beautiful so. I never worried then in arranging the rooms, and was so anxious to have it always look like a picture. I could scarcely bear even for him to misplace things."

TOPIC: PAUL AT EPHESUS.

LESSON TEXT.—Acts 19: 8-22.

GOLDEN TEXT.—And many that believed came and confessed and showed their deeds.

TIME.—A. D. 54.

1. There is a great difference between "disputing" and "persuading" yet both are necessary in the advocacy of truth, and especially of a reform in the interest of truth. Disputing convinces, persuading moves to action. Demosthenes is made to say to Cicero, "When thou speakest, all men say, 'Great is Cicero.' When I speak, they say, 'Let us march against Philip'." Unless the effect of disputing be of the "March-against-Philip" order, the effort is vain. Even disputing and persuading of the highest order, that of the divinely inspired Paul at Ephesus fails sometimes and in some cases to accomplish its purpose. Paul, however, did not therefore conclude he had not been sent or commissioned. Neither should we. Some other door will open as one closes.

2. We do not believe in the comments of some expositors concerning the special miracles wrought by the hand of Paul at Ephesus, viz.: That they were a sort of concession to the superstitious character of the population. Superstition may have wrought in the minds of the subjects of the "special miracles" a willingness and a readiness to adopt unusual means and God honored the grain of faith in these acts.

3. When false prophets arise, we are not to be alarmed. Often and often in the history of good works, from Haman to Boss Tweed, the very aims and plots of evil men are their undoing, and their failures lend brilliancy to the clear demonstration of the truth. The name of the Lord Jesus is magnified by those who set themselves to dishonor Him even now.

4. Restitution, or "the making right," is as much a part of the gospel of Christ as repentance or regeneration. In putting the books of magic beyond the possibility of future harm the Ephesians were doing all in their power to prevent and undo wrong. They counted their price perhaps for curiosity's sake, but there was no disposition or effort to "realize" upon them and use the fifty thousand pieces of silver for Christian work. This, even at so early a date, would have been scorned by the newly made Christians; and yet it would have sent out many apostles to preach the "unsearchable riches of Christ."

It is claimed that by the enactment of prohibition—the divine order with reference to all evil things—the vested interests of brewers and distillers should not be destroyed, but compensation should be made for all damages following such action. This is not according to the plan of early Christianity to say the least. Neither is it the method of Christianity today.

A short time since a lady long and usefully connected with the W. C. T. U., found herself, by a death in the family, the possessor of a considerable stock of liquors. She was for a little time confused and perplexed by the clamor of certain friends who, fearing that her temperance principles might in some way lead her to destroy the liquors, urged upon her that this was property which had providentially fallen into her hands, and property for which she would have to render account. She went to her bed praying God for clear light on duty, and in the morning opened her Bible to the text which we have quoted above. This was her answer, and she did not rest till every bottle had been broken and the liquor poured out into the sewer.

CAN THE PEOPLE BE TRUSTED?

A wise sovereign is known by his attention to the minute things of government. He is no more alert to quell the insubordination of an army than the disobedience of an individual soldier. He is not wakened from the sleep of the just by the howling of mobs in the streets, for his wakeful sense detects the first faint mutterings of harm in the distant cabins. He realizes that to the ruler there are no inconsequential things in national life, and that in all matters of evil tendency their beginnings are as serious as their endings.

Viewed in such a light are "the sovereign people" the wise rulers they have boasted themselves to be? Can the people be trusted? The bloody three-days'-reign of the Cincinnati mob may not be entire proof that they are not, but it sets forth in letters of cruel red a grave charge against them. Unraveling the long indictment it reads like this, and is addressed to each individual ruler of the nation: "Forgetting the price of your chartered liberties, the fearful cost at which they have been maintained, and the inheritance of obligation, you have selfishly given yourself over to the getting of gain, and the nation to the plunder of men who like yourself are bent on making a fortune at the least outlay, and in the shortest time. You have given no care or attention to the primary meeting and caucus—the cradle of politics in representative government—thereby consigning it to the cruel mercies of the hireling and the spoiler; you have submitted to, if not acquiesced in their ravages because of the trouble of resistance; you have been marshalled at their bidding and have been driven, gagged and bound, to the shrine of freemen there to pay the tribute of slaves to their advantage, simply because rebellion might result in some sacrifice of personal gain. Individual profit has grown dearer to you than national existence and private good than public weal and your record as a ruler is as tarnished thereby as if you had received bribes as a judge, or, as a king bartered the heritage of your subjects to fill your own coffers."

The counts in this indictment are not so many as weighty; not so astounding in words as in consequences. The man Berner, the self confessed murderer, and even the jury which conspired to aid him in escaping the full legal penalty of his confessed crime, are not more guilty at the bar of God and the shrine of pure government than the citizens who have aided by selfish neglect in the establishment of a system under which outrage takes the place of law and justice.

Representative government has its spiritual as well as written code. That violated, no penalties of the statute books avail, but in their stead comes the sure vengeance of the unseen forces, and the people suffer the punishment of sovereigns. The Cincinnati holocaust is such an avengement.

The whole people tardily aroused, seek to right the wrong committed by the individual. The impulse is healthful but the agency diseased. The body politic is sick because each member is ailing. A spasm of wholesome pain produces maniacal ravings and somebody is hurt.

Moral:—Keep each member sound, and the body will be perfect. Let each man do his duty, and the people can be trusted.

SCENES IN THE CITY STREET.

A STONE STATUE PRONE UPON THE PAVEMENT.

A great Scotch liquor firm in Chicago, marks its numerous places of business, its respectable (?) dram shops with a fine statue of some eminent Scotchman, Burns, Scott, Hugh Miller and others — who never served so mean a purpose before. Some loyal "highland laddie" has grown weary of such desecration, and one morning last week every statue lay broken on the pavement—the limbs scattered, and the headless trunk in ghastly fashion—a monarch laid low. People stop, wonder and think as they pass—who knows but they may imagine the day when the gigantic traffic that goes on unheralded now by these mighty men, shall itself lie prone upon the ground, and be trodden out of sight by a clean, clear headed generation? A day or two after this iconoclasm, came a brawny Scotchman to W. C. T. U. headquarters, asking to sign the pledge. He told of his Presbyterian training, his faithful Bible instruction and yet he had departed from it all. Will his countrymen, Hannah & Hogg, bear no part in his sin-cursed record?—they who have tempted him by the traditions and high associations of the land of heroes? Well may their gods be broken and their house be left unto them desolate.

A CROWD ON THE CORNER.

What is it? Men, full grown and bearded make up the outer rim of the solid circle. Eager eyes of men and boys are watching—what? Two poor, ragged urchins fighting. Newsboys or bootblacks evidently; in some dispute they have come to blows. Instantly from a score of doorways file out men who "bear" the stocks on the board, clerks with pen on ear, boys of street and office, all bent on "seeing the fun"—seeing wo faces torn by angry hands, eyes glaring at ach other with cruel hatred, muscles quivering with murderous determination. The presence of the crowd stimulates each boy to his worst, but if presence fails in power, you will hear from unshamed lips, "Go in Mike," "Give it to him Teddy," and every evil passion in man and boy rushes into the arena at such bidding. Men cry "stuboy" to such as these—men of home, of family, men of trade and law—and then take up their newspapers calmly next morning, and wonder what the country is coming to with so many murders, such utter recklessness of private rights and property, such disregard of human life and liberty. O, brothers, if we can call you so, who strive with good and beat back every human feeling, you are waking spirits that you cannot quell. Your own house, your own head, may yet be visited with the blows you have incited even unto blood.

The W. C. T. U. of Boston gave a delightful reception to Mrs. Mary H. Hunt on her return from the successful New York campaign. It was held in the parlors of Mrs. Joseph Cook, and addressed by Mrs. Hunt, who gave a most interesting description of the labors of the W. C. T. U. in behalf of Scientific Temperance Instruction. Mr. and Mrs. John B. Gough were invited to be present but sent the following letter regretting and explaining their absence:

Hillside, March 17, 1884.

My Dear Mrs. Cook:—I thank you for your kind invitation to be present at the parlor meeting to be addressed by Mrs. Hunt next Tuesday. I regret to say I shall be unable to have that privilege and pleasure, as I shall be, D. V., hundreds of miles from Boston that day.

Mr. Gough and I have constantly rejoiced in the work Mrs. Hunt is doing and consider it as building strong foundations for all other superstructure in the temperance reform.

Were the children and youth of our country well grounded in the scientific, moral and spiritual truths that underlie all effective endeavor in the temperance cause what victories for the right would be seen in the next generation!

We consider such work as Mrs. Hunt is doing second to no other in importance and on its largest success depends, more than is appreciated, the prosperous issue of of every phase of temperance effort.

Regretting very much my inability to be with you on Tuesday next, I am, my dear Mrs. Cook,

Yours sincerely,

Mary E. Gough.

Our national treasurer, Miss Pugh, says of her store of souvenirs:

The Oil City "pencil" doubled and multiplied, according to the promise made. I wish our "grand constituency" could every one see the box of trinkets and keepsakes sent by these girls.

Can any one doubt the result of our pioneer labors, when we know there is a "succession" to build upon our foundations, to take our experience, beginning in the fervor of youth, whereas we began with the greater inertia of maturer years. And these girls everywhere are proving this right royal succession by sacrifice and self-denial, everywhere upholding the W. C. T. U. There was in the girls' box from Oil City, Pa., the demonstration of this, in the exquisite toilette set, from some one's dressing case, the cherished cup from another hand, the dainty pencils contributed to that great Woman's Exchange, for which we are preparing. Here we hope to realize not only actual worth but also to have them bring an interest compounded from the sacrifices made.

A new chapter is being written in W. C. T. U. history. It is written in brick and mortar, and is full of such items and announcements as the following:

The Woman's Christian Temperance Union of Yonkers invites you to the laying of the corner-stone of the new temperance hall on North Broadway, near Wells avenue, Monday, March 31, 1884, at 7:30 p. m. Rev. Dr. Miller and Rev. H. M. Sanders, formerly of the Baptist church here, with the pastors of Yonkers, will take part in the ceremonies.

Tuesday evening, April 1, the W. C. T. U. anniversary will be held in the Baptist church, Warburton avenue, at 7:30 o'clock. Annual address by Miss Frances E. Willard, president National W. C. T. U.

"Cider is our great sorrow," is the frequent lament of the local union delegate to conventions. Then follows the question, "What can we do to rid ourselves of it?"

Here comes in practical answer and suggestions Miss Colman's "Readings on Cider," for sale at 58 Reade street, New York and with it methods of work, with temperance literature by the same and for sale at the same place. Both should be in the hands of every live union.

Publishers of school books are scenting the battle from afar, and not so very far either. On the title page of the new edition of Steele's "Fourteen Weeks in Physiology," may be seen this note:

Edited and endorsed for the use of schools (in accordance with the recent legislation upon this subject) by the Department of Scientific Temperance Instruction of the W. C. T. U. of the United States, under the direction of of Mrs. Mary H. Hunt, superintendent.

This is as Mrs. Carlyle would say "significant of much." Significant of a seven years war of ideas, a conflict of light with darkness. A Herculean labor with ignorance and indifference, for which, next to Him who inspired the thought, we must be thankful to the noble woman who received it from Him, into such a good and honest heart, to her whose name honors the title page of the new text book—Hygiene and Physiology. A. S. Barnes & Co. are the enterprising publishers who have caught the first inflection of the public mandate and acted upon it. The book contains not less than three chapters on alcohol, its effect upon the circulation, upon the digestive organs, and on the nervous system. These are not tacked on at the end of the book, but are placed in their natural relation to the subjects treated.

Forty years ago, these little verses were written by a beloved minister,—a father in the gospel—the Rev. W. D. Lemon, father of our Indiana president, Mrs. M. L. Wells. They read like a prophecy:

Oh, who will unite with the temperance band,
To spread sober habits all over the land;
O, come, to the life boat, by signing the pledge
You'll find it about you a beautiful hedge.
O, come while there's hope, and give us your hand,
United in peace with the temperance band.

O, American women arise in your might
To you we must look for the dawning of light,
To you we must come and assistance implore
Your influence, your faith, your prayers, ah, more—
May God speed the day and speed it He will
When your hand shall destroy the snake of the still.

Mrs. Fixen was "on the spot" when the St. Louis M. E. conference passed its unanimous resolution against intemperance and favoring woman's ballot. She says it was good to be there.

* * * * *

I find that I was mistaken, and that the North Carolina W. C. T. U. is not the publisher of the magazine recently issued so largely in W. C. T. U. interest.

* * * * *

Not every superintendent of Sunday school work can say with Mrs. Lucie B. Tyng, in the circular published last week in the Union Signal:

"Having been a member of the Sunday school all my life, and during twenty-two years a teacher of two classes every Sunday, I am second to none in my interest in the purity, as well as efficiency and responsibility of the Sunday school work."

But all are earnest, faithful workers and loved and prized as such. Mrs. Tyng belongs to a wide connection of Sunday school workers.

* * * * *

Cigarette smoking is gaining among women. A private ladies' lunch party at Delmonico's is reported, whose last course was coffee and cigarettes. A young wife of a Fifth Avenue society man, was recently sent home from her dressmaker very ill from the effects of nicotine. I am in despair.

* * * * *

Also I hear it whispered that certain fashionable New York ladies are supposed to be in Europe, but are really in the Home for Intemperate Women in New York, and that delirium tremens, with all its attendant horrors, is not a stranger to the elegant, up-town mansions, where their victims are often pretty, cultured, petted women.

* * * *

In this matter I think the family grocer licensed to sell liquors, has much to answer for. English temperance workers are alive to his deadly mischief, and are seeking legislation that shall destroy his license.

* * * * *

Mrs. Mary Byron Pease, of Ohio, now working in Pennsylvania, has organized ten unions in the past few weeks resucitated old ones, and strengthened those which are weak, and obtained a number of subscribers to The Union Signal. Her record is a fine one.

* * * * *

An enthusiastic convention was that of the Henry county, (Ill.) suffrage association. Dr. Mary F. Thomas and Miss Atkinson of Indiana, together with two state legislators of last session were active in the meeting.

* * * * *

Henry county is radical also on the temperance question. It is the home of Senator Lord, who was a temperance man before it was as popular as now. The recent republican county convention, called for a submission of the prohibitory and suffrage amendments.

* * * * *

The president of Wisconsin W. C. T. U., is going abroad with her husband, the Rev. J. E. Irish, who goes as consul to Cognac, France. No more "Cognac" if you please Mrs. Irish. I owe it a worse grudge than ever, now that its "taking off" includes you also.

* * * * *

Union Park Congregational church of Chicago, has a church temperance club just organized for educational and agitational purposes. It takes in some of the best members, young and old, and bids fair to do solid work.

* * * * *

"Anna Hathaway" she who in this generation is none other than the gifted Mrs. M. B. Ingham, of Cleveland, has a delightful sketch of Sarah K., and Charles E. Bolton, in the Cleveland Leader of March 13. These industrious educators have given away over six million pages of sound literature during the three years existence of the Cleveland Educational Bureau. "Anna Hath-a-way" of picturing noted people in type so vividly that you can just see them—at least I can.

* * * * *

Like it in noble purpose is the Temperance League of the M. E. church at Warehouse Point, Conn. Its creed is this:

No license in this town. Total abstinence for the individual. The utter prohibition of the liquor traffic everywhere. The salvation of the drinker through faith in Jesus Christ. For these we shall pray and labor.

* * * * *

Iowa women are good at repartee as everybody knows, but it seems to me I never heard anything, anywhere, to exceed this: A certain lady in an interior town followed a drinker in whom she was deeply interested into a saloon. Just as he was about to take the glass, she tapped him gently on the shoulder and requested him to go with her. He complied, and as the two marched toward the door the saloon-keeper recovered sufficiently from his amazement to ejaculate: "That beats the devil!" The lady turned and emphatically retorted: "Yes, sir, it was my intention to 'beat the devil!'"

On Duty.

News From the Field.

SOUTHERN GLEANINGS.

BY MRS. GEORGIA HULSE MCLEOD.

"Oh such handfuls of sheaves, shining like gold,
More than at one time our glad hands may hold."

Virginia.—"We watch for the weekly visits of The Union Signal. We would not miss the heart sympathy and encouragement we get from our National sisters through this organ, for any price."

So says the very able corresponding secretary of old Virginia, and so say we all. From the signs of the times there seems to be a general awakening throughout the state to the disgrace of making and selling liquors, and on the other hand an aroused rebellion and persecution on the part of the liquor men. In these results the quiet influence and persistent work of the W. C. T. U. are to be seen. Staunton has a coffee house under its auspices, the local union numbers 100 and the Band of Hope 170 members. Miss Willard's sowing here, was not vain. There is a very flourishing Band of Hope in Richmond of which Mrs. Pleasants (a host in herself) is president. There is also one in Charlottsville.

North Carolina.—The new president, Mrs. Pease of Asheville, is busily planning engagements for Miss H. G. Moore, who has done such brave work in other southern states. Mrs. E. D. Hundley, a worker comme il y en a pen, has been confined to her room for some weeks by illness, but has held the thread of the work for all in a tenacious clasp. After the meetings the ladies of Greensboro Union report to and consult with her that no idle time may be spent by others. Her letters go, welcome messengers, here and there through the state and out of it, reaching to my sanctum in the city of monuments. A monthly public gospel temperance meeting has been established under the auspices of Greensboro Union, the first held on Sabbath afternoon, a blessing and success, a crowded hall (the Y. M. C. A.) and an earnest address from Judge Dick. A very interesting Band of Hope is doing its own good work. The Asheville Union has 79 working and 59 honorary members, with 62 in the juvenile department. The Chapin Union at Trinity and Burtvell, also at High Point; this last has a Band of Hope with 60 members, and a call for an organization at Winston. So the clans are gathering for the march to victory.

South Carolina.—Home of Sallie F. Chapin, or at least so called, for she is abroad so much on her glorious mission, and has so many homes in the south land, that we do not know in these later days exactly how to give her a local habitation and a name. Wherever she may be, however, she talks to her people every day. In addition to her arduous labors on the organizing trips, she wields her pen far into the night hours. She is on the editorial staff of a live temperance paper, the Worker, published in Columbia. In Greenville the girls are zealously at work. Miss Willard will remember the union she formed in the Baptist Female College there, and will be glad to know they "have kept the faith," and that their organization is increasing in numbers and influence. The W. C. T. U. has opened an attractive reading room. Mrs. Chapin, and Mrs. Sibley of Georgia, held a recent afternoon meeting at Edgefield, and at night Mrs. Chapin addressed a large audience of colored people at the court house. The Johnston W. C. T. U. of Nashville have a column in the Broadaxe, edited by Mrs. Judge Harrison, who has promptly noted, and held up for public commendation, the late action of the people of Centreville. I. F. Dinwiddie and Buck Brown arrived in the town followed by four barrels of whisky, which were deposited in a house they had procured. The question arose, Can they sell it lawfully? This was discussed at a public meeting called by the excited citizens, who attended en masse. An executive committee was directed to execute legal proceedings against the parties complained of, who went to work in earnest, prepared a bill of injunction which was filed on Monday morning, served by ten a. m., and as every lawyer in town was on the side of the citizens, the case had to be continued to give the defendants a chance to get counsel. That evening Col. Hawkins, of Huntingdon, and Mr. Lassiter, of Lexington, arrived in town to argue a case from Lexington similar to the Centreville case. The masterly manner in which Col. Hawkins handled the subject, and the exhaustive arguments produced such an effect that the motion to dissolve was overruled. This settled the question of "whisky or no whisky," for Centreville. Before night the defendants were packing their baggage to leave for more congenial climes!

Louisiana.—New Orleans gives in the Times Democrat the account in detail of the second state convention of W. C. T. U., a convention of which all the southern states may well be proud. Mrs. Judge Merrick's address was given in full, as I wish it could be in The Union Signal, not only because it is superior, but because it shows the power and influence of brave individual effort. The seed sown by Miss Willard, cared for by Mrs. Chapin and her brave co-workers has brought this representative woman into the ranks. Hushing her own grief for a daughter beloved, gone to God, and in the sight of the voiceless anguish, the greater grief of humanity because of the rum power, they have won her to consecrate time, talents, influence all to the cause whose rallying cry is "God and home and native land." I shall send from her address fragments all through the southern press and in some cases they will publish it entire.

NEW YORK.

Poughkeepsie.—Surely you do rejoice with us, that one more state is added to the list, as having the "compulsory education law." This surely is a grand step forward. May all the sister states fall into line with Vermont, Michigan, New Hampshire and New York. Under God we owe these grand victories to our beloved sister Mrs. M. H. Hunt, of Massachusetts, the "great apostle of the children" we would christen her. And then I want to tell you that we had what might be called a "red letter day" all over the state. A day of thanksgiving and praise to Almighty God for his wonderful goodness in giving us the law, and if all the locals in the state had such an instructive and inspiring meeting as the Poughkeepsie union did, surely the people of New York must be enthused and inspired to more earnest aggresive work than ever before. The rain poured down all day here, but that did not prevent those who weathered the storm from getting a wonderful blessing if it did prevent many from meeting with us. The services occupied three hours from 2 to 5 p. m. with a different leader and topic each hour.

Mrs. M. G. Underhill, our worthy president, conducted the first hour. Rev. H. B. Grose the second, Rev. W. G. Browning the third; thus the educational law was pretty well discussed its benefits set forth, in a clear forcible manner, and its enforcement urged. May we not hope, dear sisters, that this law may prove a forerunner—a sort of John the Baptist—to prepare the way for "constitutional prohibition" for which we are all working and praying? May God grant it. R. A. T.

Dansville.—The W. C. T. U. of Livingston county, met in convention at Dansville the 28th and 29th of February and truly they were glorious days. That village so beautifully surrounded by hills with the crowning glory of "Our Home on the Hillside" was a most fitting place to hold our second county convention. We were organized last August by our true and faithful state treasurer, Mrs. E. M. J. Decker of Victor N. Y. Time and space will not permit me to go into details concerning the work done. Mrs. Decker gave us a most excellent address in the afternoon on "Practical Work." Mrs. Alford of Bradley presented the claims of Our Work, our new state paper. It is in its infancy but with high hopes of future usefulness and prosperity. In the evening a large audience gathered to listen to Mrs. M. H. Hunt. Her subject was "Waiting for the Verdict." She was listened to with marked attention for one hour and a half, showing the great and increasing interest on this subject.

The opening devotional exercises of the second day were very precious. A discussion regarding plans of work for the future were discussed. I decided to call Mrs. Decker to assist me in more fully organizing the county. The result has been most successful for we have since that time been instrumental in organizing four new unions and reviving one old one, in Genesee the county seat, with eighty-four members. We are expecting grand results for our cause as they have been wonderfully blessed with a revival of religion, over four hundred conversions are reported. With such work comes these words: "What wilt Thou have me do?"

I will close by adding the glorious news of temperance victories in six towns of our county. Danville has won the laurels; her first victory. She has been deeply entrenched by the rum power but has now risen in her might and said, Thus far but no farther shalt thou go to destroy our sons and brothers. One thing more the ministers are aroused as never before and are doing nobly for God and home and native land.

Mrs. S. B. Fowler.
President Livingston County.

Harlem.—It is with sad hearts that we announce the death of dear sister Foote. For years she has been an earnest temperance worker and reformer. One look at the good, kindly face, so full of sweet charity and Christian love, would tell you how she reached the drunkard's heart and won him back, to a nobler better life.

For months past she has been unable to meet with us, but at the usual hour of meeting, she would leave the family circle, to meet with us in spirit, joining her petition with ours for blessings on our work.

Her heart was full of the love of Christ, and each day she lived as though it were her last, so when the messenger came he found her all ready.

Quietly, as though only going a short journey, she made all arrangements for her burial, and gave away all her personal effects.

Possessed of much refinement, intelligence and large capabilities of mind, with a gentle, winning manner, crowned with much practical experience, her life was a useful one, and her death has left a void in all the circles that knew her.

The beautiful floral tribute of not, "Gates Ajar," but open wide, with "Mother" at the door and the footprints on the steps, seemed so fitting an emblem that as we looked, our eyes seemed to follow the purified spirit into the realms beyond, and faith saw the crown and the harp already in her hands.

May her mantle of gentleness, purity and love fall upon us, and may our lives be as useful, our work as successful, our death as triumphant as was hers, is the prayer of the sisters of this union.

Mrs. M. Douglas, Secy.

NEW JERSEY.

GLEANINGS BY R. P. PENFIELD.

Plainfield.—Messrs. Mabee and English and the sweet singers accompanying them, commenced their work here Feb. 22. The services of the evening were deeply solemn. One hundred signed the pledge, one of whom was a prominent business man, a hard drinker. On Saturday evening there was a large attendance although the weather was very unfavorable. Mr. English told how he obtained a character, in Poughkeepsie, by getting business men to sign his application for a license to start a saloon, and how he'd kept the license hung up in his bar room, as an evidencethat he was a respectable man.

Sabbath evening services were full of gospel truths and calculated to improve every heart of the necessity of loving obedience to God's law. One hundred more signed the pledge. Monday evening the lecture room of the church was crowded, the anti rooms all thrown open. At this meeting another prominent business man signed the pledge and fearlessly renounced his allegiance to the drink power, before the large audience and received the congratulations of all present. On Tuesday and Wednesday night, the services were held in the M. E. church. After interesting speeches from Mr. English and Dr. Gerkers, Mr. Mabee plunged into the work of pledging all who came to the altar. Many tears were shed and prayers offered, as the continuous line of men, women and children went forward and returned with the badge of their profession. Indeed the act was timely on the part of many. We praise God for many happier homes now than there were a week ago.

Thursday evening a meeting for men only—the women meeting in lecture room of First Baptist church to pray for a blessing on the men's meeting. A reform club was organized at that meeting with John H. French as president. Many more signed the pledge, and many good citizens joined the club to help their new made brethren in their crusade against all intoxicants.

The club met Friday night at Force's former liquor hotel and with banner marched to the church. As they came in the audience rose to welcome them. The meetting was intensly interesting. The president of the club John H. French spoke of his convictions that he had taken the right stand, of his determination for the future to stand up for total abstinence, and, with God's help to urge others to join their ranks and to help his associates to a truer and better life.

Mayor Maxon and Judge Good declared their intention to sustain their reformed brethren. A large number responed to Mr. Mabee's call for signatures to the pledge. Speeches, songs of praise and thanksgiving were the order of the evening. The following evening (Saturday), the Somerville Reform Club reached our city and were escorted to the temporary rooms of Plainfields club. Speeches were made by Mr. Renglemen, president of the Somerville Reform Club and Mr. English. After this service the Somerville club were escorted to the former bar and billiard room of Force's Hotel where a collation had been prepared for these invited guests. These freemen from the bondage of rum, rejoiced in the change in the premises. One young man said the last time I was in this place, I drank six rounds at the bar. Plainfield Club's president, J. H. French, then said, Gentlemen, I have rented this place for ten years for the sale of liquor, and drew a sad picture of the evil he had helped to foster. He had done this in the face of the earnest protest of his wife, who had often begged him not to lease the room for such a purpose. He not only signed applications for license, but obtained other signers, and had been one of the best customers at the bar. He now refused to rent the place for such business. He wished the honor to be given to his wife, for it was due to her entreaties that his building was closed to liquor selling. Mrs. French was called for, but being absent, it was proposed that a silent prayer of thanksgiving be offered to God for the life of the noble woman, who was so true to her convictions. The suggestion was accepted, and in silence she was carried to the mercy seat.

A union meeting was held in First Baptist church Sabbath evening, all the churches taking part. The crowd was very great, many could not enter but lingered at the threshold to catch the notes of inspiring songs. All our pastors and members of the reform club made short addresses. Mabee called on all to take the pledge and become the freemen of the Lord. A large number added their names to the roll. On Monday evening the services were held in the Crescent Avenue Presbyterian church. The distance made no change in attendance—the house was packed and there was One present, greater than the Temple. The club marched in a body from their head quarters, headed by the Plainfield brass band and a body of clergymen taking their seats in the front pews. The opening services conducted by Rev. Mr. Honeymen and Dr. Hurlbut, followed by Mabee in a very accurate review of work done. Rev. Mr. Kershaw of Bound Brook spoke of the work accomplished there. Our Mayor Maxon and city Judge Good, made short addresses by request, also John H. French president of the club. He spoke with pride of a number who took the pledge on Saturday night, and on Monday morning went to New York and resigned his position in a wholesale liquor house. Cheer on cheer followed this announcement and the gentleman was called to the platform. He told in brief, of the prayers of a devoted wife in his behalf, of the convictions he had of the evil of drink, from the fearful doom, that had overtaken a friend and the choice between salvation and damnation, and said as for me I shall choose salvation. This short address filled the house with joyous thanksgiving. Col. J. Scott gave a few choice thoughts. Rev. T. Logan Murphy, rector of the church of the Holy Cross was called upon as the representative of the church temperarce society, and gave words of encouragement to all. Mr. English made the closing speech and declared that it was God's work the people were witnessing. A large number signed the pledge. The last and largest meeting was held in First Baptist church and from the sacred desk to the front door was packed, many outside, hoping to gain an entrance some time during the evening. The galleries were reserved for "Plainfield's Reform Club." After they were seated the crowd filled in. After devotional exercises, Mr. Mabee gave a political speech short and to the point. Major Maxon then addressed the meeting concerning the benefit of the work of these evangelists to this city and urged the people to show their gratitude by a liberal contribution. The collection over, John H. French came forward on behalf of the club, and handed Mr. Mabee a purse of $200, not to pay them for services, but a small token of love and gratitude. The rest of the hour was spent in song and testimony from the members of the club, with farewell words from Mr. English. One of the young men converts told how he was saved from drink and sin, then came to our ears in softest, sweetest strain the refrain,

"I have been redeemed, I have been redeemed
By the blood of the Lamb which flowed on Calvary."

And as we looked over that vast audience, and to the reform club, we saw as if by an angel's touch, the emblem of blood on the lintel to every man's heart, and knew the destroying spirit had passed by these newly consecrated men and women who had taken the pledge.

So this ribband of red shall be to these pledged men, as a sign or a covenant for good. If tempted or ridiculed, let them as did Catherine Brettage, say, after a great conflict with Satan. "Reason not with me. I am a poor weak woman; if thou hast any thing to say, say it to my Christ, He is my advocate, my strength and my Redeemer, and He shall plead for me." On Wednesday afternoon a mass meeting for women only was held. The W. C. T. union and the Band of Hope and a large force of Red Ribbons filled the lower part of the church. Messrs. Mabee and English led the devotional services assisted by their associates. Mr. Mabee gave a brief sketch of his experience and reformation, and then presented the W. C. T. U. constitution and pledge, calling upon all the ladies to unite with the union, which was responded to by a large number. A collection was also taken up for the W. C. T. U., after which our union presented a cash gift to the ladies of the evangelists as a token of love and sympathy.

Clair, where the evangels have gone, one hundred and fifty signed the pledge at their first meeting. Joy and gladness fills many a household this Saturday evening, indeed the whole city is full of gladness, thanksgiving and praise for mercies received.

Mrs. Foster has just given a week to New Jersey, speaking in Hackettstown, Lambertville, Flemington, Washington, Jersey City, Camden, and Woodbury; everywhere she met with large and appreciative audiences. At Flemington the Baptist church, which will hold twelve hundred, was filled; the W. C. T. U. one hundred and forty strong, marched in a body to seats reserved in the centre of the house, and received the "Chautauqua salute" from the vast audience assembled. "Bless those white-ribbon women, bless those white-ribbon women!" was the heart-felt utterance of Mrs. Foster as she sat upon the platform and looked into the earnest faces of the body of women before her.

The corresponding secretary of the state, whose home is in Flemington presided, the different pastors took part in the opening exercises, the glee club of the Reform Club gave excellent music, and "best of all, God was with us." Mrs. Foster held her audience without a break by her grand argument for constiutional prohibition. The seed sown must take root, and bring forth fruit. Quite a large number of lawyers were present and evinced by their earnest attention and appreciative applause that her argument was thoroughly practicable. The following evening the ladies of the W. C. T. U. gave a supper, a fine affair, and cleared $107. So "our cause is marching on" in New Jersey.

Mrs. J. T. Ellis.

ILLINOIS.

Rockford.—One of the most enjoyable entertainments was given the evening of March 14, in the First Congregational church of Rockford, by our Band of Hope which it has been our fortune to attend in many a day.

The organist and choir of the church wherein it was held, assisted with appropriate selections from temperance songs, rendering them most acceptably. Miss Kittie Waugh, president of the Band of Hope, presided as "one to the manner born." Miss Abbie Birdsell, one of Rockford's "star" elocutionists, whose fame reaches afar, and of whom we feel justifiably proud, as belonging to us, rendered two very telling selections picturing the drunkard's doom as betrayed in a dream, as from the beautiful hilltop of society's social glass, the descent into a darkness of the doom awaiting the drunkard at the foot of this inclined plane; also the little girl's question why "Papa's kisses weren't nice and sweet, but tasted so nasty, and smoky and bad?"

Another of our own natural born elocutionists added much to the entertainment by two "readings", so called, although we failed to see why, as no book nor mauuscript was visible. Her first selection was the picture of a drunken father with his two children, whom in his drunken fury he had thrown into the seething waters of the river and cruelly drowned, followed by a touching appeal to all who listened to banish from our beautiful country the curses of alcohol. A second "reading" was the "White Elephant", and was a decided hit which "brought down the house."

Interspersed in happy fashion were songs—solos and choruses—several members of the Band rendering selections in a faultless manner, some wee ones taking their stand upon the rostrum witn a composure enviable to many older ones present.

The closing little impromptu address by the president was as pleasing a feature perhaps, as any of the evening, and I venture to say that every one in the house was at the close of the evening looking forward to another entertainment by the same organization in the near future. And all was presented for the small admission fee of ten cents!

WISCONSIN.

Whitewater.—On the 22d of February Mrs. Mary B. Willard gave her address on "Home Protection" to a large and appreciative audience in Whitewater. On the afternoon of Saturday following a W. C. T. U. was organized, which proves to be of the right spirit, I think, as it continually increases in numbers and enthusiasm.

At its second meeting held Tuesday, March 18, there were forty-six ladies present and about fifty names reported on the secretary's book which is a better showing than some of our older unions can boast.

Two superintendents reported as started in their work; a committee appointed to ascertain the laws of Wisconsin on the subject of selling to minors, etc., reported with a copy of the law in hand ready to read; committees were appointed to examine further into this matter.

The neatness and dispatch with which the meeting was carried out would have done credit to a much older union, and was largely owing to the fact that our excellent president came before us with note book in hand, thoroughly prepared for the duties of the hour, and ready at every turn with the "What next" so confusing to some W. C. T. U. meetings.

We have great hopes for the new union. Already King Alcohol begins to tremble. E. C. G.

PENNSYLVANIA.

Oil City.—The Y. W. C. T. U. of Oil City was organized by Miss Gordon in the autumn of 1882. We started off very bravely, purchasing a secretary's book, a treasurer's book, a handsome plush autograph album and white satin badges on which were printed Y. W. C. T. U. and "For God and home and native land." We held weekly meetings for a short time and then we stopped and went into a sound sleep for nine months in genuine Rip Van Winkle style.

A letter from Miss Gordon followed by two sweet pictures which you would certainly recognize, dear Union Signal, made us start up and rub our eyes. We reorganized Sept. 18, 1883, and went to work again and it was work. Every thing seemed against us and I think we would have given up entirely had it not been for the letters of Miss Gordon and Mrs. Patten. By their help and that of our own W. C. T. U. ladies our difficulties have been overcome.

The union now numbers twenty-five. The average attendance of members the past quarter was twelve with an aggregate of twenty-one visitors.

Twenty-three meetings have been held since September, seventy-six letters and postals mailed and a large number received among these an autograph letter from John G. Whittier.

11,239 pages of literature have been distributed since Jan. 19. Of this 4,305 pages of temperance literature in Oil City and the rest (2,812 of general, 2,236 of religious and 1,886 of temperance literature) in weekly installments to the eighty-two inmates of the county almhouse, for which the superintendent has sent the union a letter of earnest thanks. Now all tracts, papers, etc., sent out by the union are stamped with Y. W. C. T. U. Oil City, Pa., and "For God and home and native land." We take this opportunity to return our thanks to R. H. Smith & Co., of Springfield, Mass., for the rubber stamp.

The destitute of our city early received the attention of the young ladies and with the help of Mrs. Ferry, the W. C. T. U. Bible-woman, forty-one articles of warm clothing and five bed comforts were distributed among them.

Two socials have been held; the first, a lunch party in Temperance Hall, netted $93.40. All but ten dollars of this was voted to the W. C. T. U. then in need of funds. The second, a leap year party at the residence of Mr. and Mrs. Wesley Chambers. Refreshments were served and a program of music, recitations and tableaux, was rendered. Beautifully tinted pledge cards ornamented with bright colored ribbons were presented to the guests as memetoes of the evening. The collection amounted to $18.06.

The union is at present reading Dr. Richardson's Lectures on Alcohol and hope soon to have a good temperance loan library.

Mrs. McConnell is now holding a very successful series of temperance meetings in Oil City under the auspices of the W. C. T. U. The young ladies assist by acting as secretary, when necessary taking up the collections, giving out the pledge cards and pinning on the ribbons.

We have been much interested in the plan of "The Souvenir and Jewelry Fund," and sent to Miss Pugh two gold lead pencils, a silver perfume stand, and a silver cup.

The outlook for our union is now very cheering and we hope with God to help us to do much more in the future "For God and home and native land"

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Washington.—Mrs. J. R. Nichols, of Indianapolis, a superintendent of the N. W. C. T. U., spoke last evening in the lecture room of the Metropolitan M. E. church, at Four-and-a-half and C streets, upon the subject of temperance. The Rev. Dr. Huntly presided. After the reading of Scripture, prayer, and the singing of a hymn, Mrs. Nichols was introduced. She said she would not treat her subject from a legal, but from a social point of view. Women are the autocrats of society and the chief agents in the elevation of the social circle. Women are culpable for the popularizing of drinking in society which exists to such a great extent at the present time. Mrs. Nichols referred more especially to the amount of drinking done by fashionable society women, and who, in many instances, had by their example made men irreclaimable drunkards. If women are not entitled to the right of suffrage they should at least entertain the earnest sentiment of not receiving in their drawing rooms and parlors those who are engaged in the liquor traffic. Let women beware how they tamper with such a dangerous weapon as strong drink.

There is one feature, said Mrs. Nichols, that temperance speakers do not touch upon, and that is women drinking among themselves. If the drinking among men is generally among the middle and lower classes, that among women is in the upper classes of society. The speaker referred to statistics taken in an eastern city, where 2,000 women, all moving in the more respectable class of the community, were inmates of an inebriate asylum. A Kentucky belle boasted of the beautiful color she could get up by drinking a half pint of wine at dinner and then taking a short repose. Mrs. Nichols said she had seen women at a New York club dinner reel from drinking wine. She referred to cultured, Christian mothers, who gave their babes toddy, and made them drunk with their own milk. A drunken man is a spectacle to be abhorred, but when it comes to a drunken woman, the speaker said, the angels of heaven hide their faces from so revolting a spectacle. Women are also the greatest sufferers from intemperance. What agony it is to a high-spirited, sensitive woman who once looked up with pride to her husband, to see him dragged down to the lowest depths of drunkenness and degradation. There is not a home in the land that is not tainted with the foul miasma from the liquor traffic. It takes the light from the poet's brain, reduces the strength of youth to the weakness of old age, and the flower of womanhood becomes scentless and withered. The liquor traffic causes a woman's heart to bleed, it blasts her hopes, and fills her soul with despair.

In closing Mrs. Nichols made an eloquent appeal to the motherhood of the nation—women whom God exalted, and through whom the world is to be redeemed. "Why, in all the legislatures of the country," said the speaker, "has not something been done for the motherhood of the nation, in protecting them from the liquor traffic, which is both the curse of God and man—to save her babe sacrificed upon this unholy Moloch? How can a country," she exclaimed, "glory in the renown of its warriors, the eloquence of its statesmen, and its wonderful prosperity, when its foundations are cemented with the blood of the victims of the liquor traffic?"

Mrs. Nichols' address was an eloquent one, and engaged the profound attention of her intelligent audience, Dr. Huntley, chaplain of the United States senate in closing said, "He would be glad to sit at her feet at any time and learn of her on any phase of the subject she might select." ## LOUISIANA.

SECOND ANNUAL CONVENTION.

The Woman's Christian Temperance Union of Louisiana met in convention March 6 and 7 at the rooms of the Young Men's Christian Association.

The address of welcome to delegates was made by Mrs. Frances A. Lyons. Mrs. Lyons reviewed briefly the work of the temperance women of the state during the past year, and enriched her address by many beautiful expressions concerning the women who had come south and from all over the state to attend the convention.

The Rev. S. H. Werlein delivered an eloquent address of welcome on behalf of the clergy. It was such a tribute to women as made the hearts of those present grateful for the manly encouraging words.

A response on the part of delegates was made by Mrs. William H. Goodale, of Baton Rouge.

Mrs. Goodale's address did not occupy ten minutes in the delivery, but her brief sentences were earnest and eloquent with facts showing how great the need of more temperance work in Louisiana.

The morning session was closed by a consecration meeting, presided over by Mrs. Hannah Whitall Smith, a lovely Quaker lady, who had come all the way from Pennsylvania to attend the convention. Her talk to women was the talk of a brilliant and accomplished woman, who is also a wife, a mother and a Christian.

In the evening a large and attentive audience assembled at the St. Charles Avenue church, corner of St. Charles and Gen. Taylor streets, in order to hear Mrs. Caroline E. Merrick, the president of the local temperance union, deliver her annual address.

After the choir had discoursed sweet music Mrs. Merrick was introduced by Mrs. Sallie F. Chapin, of South Carolina, who reminded the audience that Mrs. Merrick was the first women to speak in the church in which they were assembled.

Mrs. Merrick's address was listened to with undivided attention, and when she closed her eloquent appeal for women to work for the temperance cause, she was warmly applauded.

Mrs. Sallie F. Chapin, of South Carolina, made a short address. She stated that Louisiana was more in need of temperance workers than any other state she has ever visited. The speaker said that she happened to be in Louisiana at the last election and had noticed that the negroes went to the polls stupidly drunk, or like dumb driven cattle. Mrs. Chapin said that the women must decisively work for temperance in order to help the emigrants who are sweeping into the south and who will have the right to vote in Louisiana in one year. To do so intelligently and for public good it became necessary to take up collections. She closed by asking, for the good of human beings, a small contribution from all those present.

A collection was taken up which amounted to thirty dollars.

At the request of Mrs. Merrick, Mrs. Angele C. Davis, of Cincinnati, O., made a short speech, and was applauded.

The evening meeting was closed with a prayer by Bishop Parker.

The exercises of the second day of the convention were more largely attended than on the first day.

The devotional exercises were conducted by Mrs. Hannah Whitall Smith, of Philadelphia.

Reports of the progress of the work done by the different state unions were read by the following delegates: Mrs. M. J. Hatch, of Baton Rouge; Mrs. R. Aby of Monroe; Miss Dosie Dupree, of Baton Rouge; Mrs. Goodale, of Baton Rouge; Mrs. Smith, of Ouachita; Mrs. Wm. Wise, of Shreveport, and Mrs. Merrick, of New Orleans.

Baton Rouge Union has a membership of 104; Band of Hope 120; colored auxiliary 30.

Monroe Union a membership of 140; Trenton Union has 125 members with the following auxiliaries:

Colony Union 42 members; Island Union 42 members; Mineral Springs Union, 22 members; Trenton Colored Union 50 members. Shreveport Union reported 125 members with a Band of Hope numbering 50.

The ladies of this union determined on aggressive work for the fall and winter, and looking about, the great crying necessity seemed to be to help influence the young men of this wicked but prosperous little city. The conclusion arrived at was that a cheery, bright reading room would be a very certain foil to the drinking saloons. The city was then divided into districts, committees of ladies took each district and canvassed among all the business houses, not passing the saloons, whose proprietors were most polite and kind in receiving and responding to the request of the ladies; one of three is a monthly subscriber to the fund for the reading room, which is now an established fact. A great success. A large beautiful, well furnished room in the most avorable business portion of the city, carpeted, $25 given for the purpose of purchasing a picture, and a beautiful lamp hanging before the entrance, the gift of a generous Texan, is a counter-charm, a shining reproof to the gaudy lights of the attractive drinking rooms, which surround it. There is a library of 250 bound volumes, not ordinary books, not books which could be conveniently left out of a home library, but generous, unselfish gifts of those who love the cause. A committee of ladies visit the rooms every day, place fresh flowers in the vases, and in cold weather see that abundant fires are kept up, and a number of papers and magazines are taken each month. The regular monthly subscription obtained from the best business men in the city amounts to $50; the average attendance is fifteen each evening.

Mrs. Merrick reported for New Orleans: Membership over 100, composed of the ladies representing the various Christian denominations of the city, whose zeal in Christian work is only measured by their ability. They have under discussion the establishment of a temperance lunch house, which only needs the hearty co-operation of a few gentlemen to come forward and give such material aid as will insure the success of the enterprise. They also expect to establish a temperance lunch room at the World's Exposition. There is a standing committee who regularly visit the hospitals, asylums and prisons.

Miss J. P. Moore represented the work among the colored people of the city and its suburbs. She stated that the intemperance among this class was fearful, and on the plantations the vice prevailed as much among the women as among the men. This eminent Christian worker made a strong appeal for missionary temperance work among the colored people of Louisiana.

Mrs. M. R. Cooney presented the following resolutions commemorative of the virtues and excellencies of the noted Christian philanthropist, Mrs. S. N. Moody, who was elected corresponding secretary for the state of Louisiana at the last convention.

Resolved, That in the death of Mrs. Moody, who was elected corresponding secretary at our last convention, the State of Louisiana has lost a most efficient official, and that we deeply sympathize with the bereaved family, and inscribe a page in our minute book to her memory.

At 3 p. m. Mrs. Chapin called the afternoon session to order, and after the usual devotional exercises, the organ of the National Woman's Christian Temperance Union, The Union Signal was presented. This paper was fully endorsed and its circulation commended to the ladies of the south.

Mrs. Lewis, a colored woman, was invited to the platform, and made a short address.

Mrs. W. H. Goodale, chairman of the committee on resolutions and plan of work, reported as follows:

Whereas, We are firmly convinced that the traffic in intoxicating liquor is an evil, and that continually; at war with the sacred interests of individuals and society; antagonizing morality, education and religion; producing disease, poverty, lawlessness and crimes; filling our jails, almshouses and asylums with inmates at the public expense; subverting the family, social and religious influences; carrying unnumbered thousands of our noblest and best to drunkards' graves; and that we are most profoundly convinced that the only remedy for this gigantic evil is total abstinence and prohibition; be it, therefore,

Resolved, That we the members of the W. C. T. U. of Louisiana, in convention assembled, do hereby earnestly appeal to our sisters, in all parts of our beloved Louisiana, to unite with us in our determination to patronize and encourage, when practicable, only such persons who are known neither to sell nor furnish as a beverage anything that can intoxicate, and who discourage the traffic in such liquors by refusing to sign petitions in favor of, and to vote for, the licensing of such traffic.

Resolved, That we do hereby appeal to the members of the several grange organizations in this state to encourage, by giving preference in trade to those merchants who are open temperance advocates, and thus aid us in our efforts to protect our homes from the curse of a law that punishes the wife and children for the sins of the father, and which is a disgrace to any civilized people, i. e., "License for Revenue."

Resolved, That we do earnestly invoke the co-operation of the members of every union and temperance organization in Louisiana to obtain signatures to petition our legislature at its next session to prohibit the distillation of liquors in our state.

Resolved, That we do respectfully pray and urge the legislature of Louisiana to amend the present local option law, now in operation in many sections of the state, so as to specifically indicate the officials charged with the duty of enforcing the provisions of said law, and to attach a penalty which shall be imposed upon failure on the part of such officials to discharge such duties.

Resolved, That as we believe intemperance and the legalized traffic in intoxicating liquors to be the greatest obstacle at this time in the way of the increase of the kingdom of our Lord Jesus Christ, that we beg all ministers of the gospel to bring these subjects often to the attention of their congregations, and to invite their personal influence in every laudable effort to banish this monster evil from the church and society at large.

Resolved, As lessons inculcated in early life are the most lasting, we beg the earnest co-operation of the public, private and Sunday school teachers to assist us in this reform to secure thorough teaching of temperance in all our schools, and the moral and physical evils resulting from the use of all alcoholic stimulants.

Resolved, That all temperance workers be urged to have a day set apart as "Children's Temperance Day" in every township in Louisiana, and hold public meetings, with such exercises as shall promote the cause of temperance among the young people of our state.

Resolved, Inasmuch as it is essential to all moral reforms to have information and facts spread broadcast over the land, we do engage and urge each member of our union to act as agent for our official organ, The Union Signal, published at Chicago, Ill., and that we will subscribe ourselves and obtain as many subscriptions among our people as possible.

Resolved, That all papers in the state be earnestly requested to publish these resolutions for the information of the public.

PLAN OF WORK.

Scientific Temperance.—The introduction of scientific temperance and hygienic instruction into all schools, public and private, in the bounds of our state, and to secure such legislation, local and state, as shall make the study and teaching of the laws of health, with special reference to the effect of stimulants upon the human system, compulsory.

Influencing the Press and Public Bodies.—Influencing the press and large public organizations, ecclesiastical, educational, medical, etc., in the cause of temperance. These two works were combined, and Mrs. W. H. Goodale, of Baton Rouge, was elected superintendent.

Sunday School Work.—Introduction of temperance literature and work in Sabbath schools. Mrs. S. Landrum, of New Orleans, was elected superintendent.

Temperance Literature.—To encourage and distribute temperance literature throughout the state. Mrs. Linus Parker, of New Orleans, superintendent.

Juvenile Work.—Organizing bands of hope, legions of honor, etc., among the children. Mrs. Seaman, of New Orleans.

Flower Mission and Young Woman's Work.—Mrs. Wm. H. Wise, of Shreveport, superintendent.

Work among Railroad Men.—Christian temperance work among railroad employes, and securing railroad rates for temperance workers. Mrs. Kate B. Avery, of Baton Rouge, superintendent.

Evangelistic Work.—Mrs. J. N. Pharr, of Morgan City, superintendent.

We suggest that a State Organizer be appointed by the executive committee, whose expenses shall be paid by the state union.

Rev. Dr. Carter opened the evening meeting by a prayer.

Mrs. Merrick then introduced Mrs. Sallie F. Chapin.

Mrs. Chapin said that woman's work was something new, and that southern woman's work was still newer. In referring to intemperance she said that all families were troubled with the curse. Every family has some interest in this matter. Mrs. Chapin here gave some striking examples.

In speaking of high license Mrs. Chapin said that the Lord never licenses sin, and consequently, she did not see what good was done in licensing liquor. God's law is prohibition, and therefore, she urged its adoption.

Mrs. Chapin here made a beautiful allegory representing alcohol as the giant Goliah, and the women of the Christian Temperance Union, as Davids, who, though small, would soon slay the mighty giant.

People sometimes have said that the reason women were taking so much interest in the temperance cause was that they desired finally to vote at the elections. This, the speaker said, was not the case and had nothing to do with the W. C. T. U.

Mrs. Chapin then described the W. C. T. U. as a great inventor, laboring hard, who would soon succeed in their enterprise.

Mrs. Chapin closed by urging that the idea of high license was absurd, and that what was wanted was prohibition.

Mrs. Angele C. Davis, of Cincinnati, spoke of Ohio, her native state. The men there were of opinion that it was not popular to be a temperance man, but they have commenced to change. The speaker had been connected with this organization for a number of years and the women of the highest families of the country were connected in the great cause.

Mrs. Davis stated that 125,000 women were bent on doing one thing and they would no doubt succeed. When women desire to do something it only requires that the will be really there and then the thing is done. There is no doubt that the talking of 125,000 would bring constitutional prohibition.

The speaker urged the importance of having scientific instruction for the children in order to let them know that great foe of mankind—alcohol. While the men must do away with drinking, constitutional prohibition must be had. The only thing the women can do is to ask the men to help them in their task. For the women cannot be legislators and make the laws.

ANOTHER
Special Offer.

Arrangements have been made with the publishers by which we are enabled to offer Tunison's Matchless, Historical County, Railroad, Distance and Index Map of the United States, and Illustrated Map of the World, as a Premium upon exceptionally good terms.

A double map, about four by five feet in size, mounted on rollers, bound with tape, colored, varnished and finished in the highest style of the art, with reversible attachment; shows the states on the largest scale possible to give the whole United States on one sheet. The counties are about one inch square, each in separate color, and the names are bold and plain. With each map is supplied, free of cost, a copy of "Tunison's Rapid County Finder, or Index," giving complete index of position and population of every county in the United States, by a superior method, used and adopted in the official publications of the government.

The style of engraving has never before been equaled; the names of the counties and county seats stand out bold and plain, and the diamond lettering enables us to show thousands of stations and postoffices not shown in other maps.

The map was constructed by the most accomplished draughtsmen and engravers, is based on government surveys, official railroad information, and its accuracy is unequaled, four to twenty years newer in design, possessing every quality and merit, and justly deserves the character expressed in its title, "matchless, historical, county, railroad, distance and index map."

This map shows all the new counties correct to date, including the thirty-two (32) new counties made last year. It also shows where every tribe of Indians is located, and gives the number inhabiting each reservation. Also shows all the new western surveys, mining towns and stage stations, and every post office in the west.

The rivers are double lined as far as navigable, enabling us to tell how far boats can ascend any river.

This is also a complete railroad and distance map, giving the names of the railroads printed on them, so we can tell what railroad to take to go to any town or place, and the distance is marked between the stations with figures; thus we can find the shortest route, cost of travel, and exact distance between any two places.

On the reverse side are three complete maps of the world; also separate maps of Europe, Egypt and the Holy Land.

The globular map (in hemispheres) shows the world round, as it actually is, and on a flattened scale, as it appears to us in traveling over it, and is one of the latest and best maps of the world published, showing latest discoveries in the Arctic regions, giving the explorations of the "Hall" and the "Herald Jeannette" expeditions, showing the islands discovered and named by them, within 400 miles of the north pole.

We have in this map the ocean routes of inter-communication, with distances marked from port to port; telegraph cables in the different oceans, and the routes of African explorations from the beginning of this century to those of Livingstone and Stanley.

Below the map of the world is a "Chart of the World," on Mercator's projection, showing voyages of discovery from earliest times to the present date. Names of navigators and the date of the voyages are given alongside each route. The degrees of heat and cold are given by Isothermal lines crossing those countries having same average temperature.

The distribution of races of mankind (illustrated by typical heads, in primary and secondary varieties, as taught by Prof. Guyot), is shown by a system of parallel rulings at different angles, covering the face of inhabited countries. The prevailing religions of the various countries are also shown, defined by different colors. Points of greatest depth in the several oceans, from official soundings are shown.

The small globes show the animal and vegetable life of both continents, arranged according to the zones to which they are native, with explanatory text. Bordering the globular map of the world are the eighty-one flags of the world. In the lower left hand quarter is our diamond map of Europe, and in the lower right hand quarter is our topographical map of the Holy Land, with ancient and modern names, showing modern Egypt in detail, railroad system, Suez Canal, Delta of the River Nile, the Sinaitic peninsula, etc. A map of the ancient world shows the travels of St. Paul, as recorded in Holy Writ, besides names and locations of places mentioned in the New Testament, the route of the wanderings of the Israelites from Egypt into Canaan, is shown according to reliable modern Bible scholars.

The columns on the sides show the different coins used in all parts of the world, giving the value of each in United States money. And in the triangular spaces we have a condensed historical and statistical description of the world. The variations of time in different parts of the world is shown by an original system. Clock dials, fifteen degrees apart, show the time of day at all places on those meridians when it is noon at London and "just the way the clocks tick all around the world." At the top are original illustration showing the costumes, and architectures, also a landscape scene in the principal nations of the world.

This map contains more than 100 illustrations. Among them are views of celebrated places, cathedrals, places, etc., of the Old World, and engravings of the government buildings in Washington—capitol, treasury, patent office, postoffice, department of the navy, war, and state, White House, etc., and many engravings of natural scenery, and great engineering works in the United State, with measurements and descriptions. No brief description can do this great work justice But you can see this map is far ahead of all others. The publisher claims ten improvments: First, the distance marked between stations; second, names on the railroads; third, small towns given; fourth, the new counties; fifth, the new surveys; sixth, the "sea shell" tint colors; seventh eighth, three maps of the world; rivers double lined as far as navigable; ninth, separate maps of Egypt, the Holy Land Europe; and tenth, the more than 100 illustrations forming a pictorial history of the world, showing what kind of people inhabit each country, styles of their dress, structures they build, houses they live in; a landscape view in each; and the political subdivisions; prevailing religions; degrees of heat and cold; products and exports; animals common there; the flag of the nation; the coins from lowest to highest denomination, and value of each in our money. Then, with the views of palaces, cathedrals, places, cities, etc., we have a complete pictorial history of the world. Retail price of the Map and Index Book, $4.00.

Vegetable Sicilian
HALL'S HAIR RENEWER.

The great popularity of this preparation, after its many years of test, should be an assurance, even to the most skeptical, that it is really meritorious. Those who have used Hall's Hair Renewer know that it does all that is claimed.

It causes new growth of hair on bald heads—provided the hair follicles are not dead, which is seldom the case; restores natural color to gray or faded hair; preserves the scalp healthful and clear of dandruff; prevents the hair falling off or changing color; keeps it soft, pliant, lustrous, and causes it to grow long and thick.

Hall's Hair Renewer produces its effects by the healthful influence of its vegetable ingredients, which invigorate and rejuvenate. It is not a dye, and is a delightful article for toilet use. Containing no alcohol, it does not evaporate quickly and dry up the natural oil, leaving the hair harsh and brittle, as do other preparations.

BRAIN AND NERVE FOOD.

FROM THE NERVE-GIVING PRINCIPLES OF THE OX-BRAIN and WHEAT GERM.

VITALIZED PHOSPHITES.—Restores the energy lost by nervousness, weakness or indigestion; relieves lassitude and neuralgia; refreshes the nerves tired by worry, excitement or excessive sensitiveness, and strengthens a failing memory. It aids wonderfully in the mental and bodily growth of infants and children. Under its use the teeth come easier, the bones grow better, the skin smoother, the brain acquires more readily and rests and sleeps more sweetly. An ill fed brain learns no lessons, and is excusable if peevish. It gives a more intellectual and happier childhood. It does away with that feeling of weakness and exhaustion which impels to the use of alcoholic beverages, and directly counteracts a cause of depravity and suffering which has baffled the efforts of religion and morality. Not a secret remedy; formula on every label. For sale by Druggists, or mail, $1.

Signal Notes.

"I WANT to tell you a secret," said William Wirt to his daughter. "The way to make yourself pleasing to others is to show that you care for them. This is the spirit that gives to your time of life its sweetest charms. It constitutes the sum total of all the witchcraft of women. Let the world see that your first care is for yourself, and you will spread the solitude of the upas tree around you."—Sel.

WHAT greater thing is there for two human souls, than to feel that they are joined for life—to strengthen each other in all labor, to rest on each other in all sorrow, to minister to each other in all pain, to be one with each other in silent unspeakable memories at the moment of the last parting?—Selected.

A large edition of this intensely interesting and instructive book has been placed at our disposal by the publishers and we are enabled to offer it to our subscribers at a wonderfully low price.

The author's biographer, speaking of the circumstances under which this book was written, says:

Although cut off by his protracted confinement from all opportunity of public preaching, he was, in the overruling providence of God, more extensively useful than while in the enjoyment of unfettered liberty; for having during his leisure hours exerted the extraordinary talents with which he was endowed, he produced the PILGRIM'S PROGRESS—a work which has been more extensively circulated, and done more good in the world than any other book except the Bible alone."

The great popularity of this book is shown in the fact that it has been translated into every language on the continent of Europe.

It should be in every family. Parents can give no better instruction to their children than by laying before them a copy of this excellent book.

Miscellaneous Selections.

THE Christian Advocate of New York city, says: "The Young Men's Christian Association has just received imperial endorsement. The associations of Pottsdam, the Province of Bradensburg, and Berlin held a meeting at Pottsdam. The Emperor allowed them to visit his park and palace, and sent them an invitation to an interview. Three hundred young men went into the presence of their venerable sovereign. He had the presidents personally presented to him, and made them the following pregnant speech:

'You do well to gather the young men into associations, these prevent them from going to the beer houses.'

This is the testimony of the Emperor of Germany to the character and influence of beer and beer-houses in Germany upon young men. It answers all the sophisms and falsehoods of the brewers and their friends.

Facts and Reasons.

Effects Produced by AYER'S SARSAPARILLA and by Nothing Else so Perfectly.

It strengthens and invigorates sufferers from enervation, languor, weakness, and mental depression.

It has an almost magical effect in curing eruptive and cutaneous disorders.

It eradicates from the blood the taint of that terribly destructive disease, Hereditary Scrofula.

It expels from the system the baneful poison of Mercury, which is as serious as that of Scrofula.

It purifies and regenerates the life current polluted by the corruption of contagious disease.

It stimulates the secretory organs, effects the removal of all impurities from the blood and makes it new, rich, and pure.

It restores health to sufferers from thin blood and impaired vitality.

It saves, by its thorough purification of the blood, from Rheumatism, Rheumatic Gout, and Tubercular Consumption.

It cures Scrofulous affections of the Liver and Kidneys, and their symptoms, Jaundice and Dropsy.

It cures Scrofulous Catarrh, Itching Humors, and the purulent Sores caused by Scrofula.

It clears and improves the complexion.

It neutralizes the poisons left in the system by Diphtheria and Scarlet Fever, and restores the debilitated patient to perfect health and vigor.

It is, in short, an unfailing remedy for all disorders arising from impurity of the blood, where such disorders are not become so deeply seated as to [illegible] all human aid.

Public Library Boylston st 20785

Advantages that AYER'S SARSAPARILLA Possesses over all Others.

It is composed of the most efficacious alterative, diuretic, and tonic drugs known in pharmacy, among which are the genuine Honduras Sarsaparilla, Yellow Dock, Stillingia, and the Iodides of Potassium and Iron.

It is a highly concentrated medicine, scientifically and honestly compounded so as to secure to it the highest degree of activity and perfect uniformity.

It has received the hearty endorsement of the leading men in the medical profession, who recognize it as a standard pharmaceutical preparation, and prescribe it in their practice.

It contains no poisonous minerals or other dangerous drugs, the use of which for temporary effect in the many crude and cheap mixtures sold as alteratives, produces effects on the system often worse than the diseases they are offered to cure.

It costs no more than any other, but would still be the cheapest blood-purifying medicine in the world, even were its price three times greater, since it is the only one that does "real, lasting good."

It has been before the public for nearly forty years, and has constantly grown in popular favor, both at home and abroad, until there is hardly a place in the civilized world where it has not a host of friends, made so by its marvellous cures.

It has been used in, and approved by, at least 4,000,000 families in the United States, and 7,000,000 throughout the world. Women have especial reasons for commending it.

It has proven its potency in curing obstinate, deeply-seated, and long-standing diseases caused by vitiation of the blood. It must not, however, be expected and is not claimed that a single bottle will cure such cases; but patients should persevere in the use of this remedy until a radical cure is effected.

It is the only blood-purifier that has won and retained the confidence of the people of all tropical countries, where such medicines are much required.

It is the only medicine of its class that sailors, as a rule, have any faith in — and they are right.

The Union Signal

OFFICIAL ORGAN OF THE WOMAN'S NATIONAL CHRISTIAN TEMPERANCE UNION.

"Thou hast given a banner to them that fear Thee; that it may be displayed because of the Truth; that Thy beloved may be delivered."

VOL. X.—NO. 15. CHICAGO, APRIL 10, 1884. $1 75 PER YEAR.

MR. FRANCIS MURPHY passed through Chicago this week on his way from Manistee, Mich., to Freeport, Ill. Three thousand persons signed the pledge during his labors in Manistee, and the city elections will probably mark the height of the temperance tide. Mr. Murphy looks well and bids fair to fill up the large measure of a long and useful life.

THE first license law was enacted in 1440, for the "gode rule and governance of the boroughe" Walsall by the "Mayer and his brethren." A check was soon found necessary and followed. "Also it is ordeyned, that if any man kepe at the ale or sportynge in theyre houses, aft. the howers appoynted to make a fyne therefore, and to sessed by the Mayer. And if by ons or twyes warning do not amend, then the same ale house to be put down by the commandments of the Mayer and his brethren."

AN English gentleman with a faith in hard, unromantic statistics, has carefully studied the causes of pauperism among 254 cases sheltered by the workhouses of Manchester. Old age, he found, had brought thither nearly one-eighth; disease and accident one-seventh; idleness, free from drink or crime, not a case; drunkenness in men, one-fourth; drunkenness in women, one-twentieth. The widows and children of drunkards numbered one-fifth of all paupers. And the cold proof from these facts is that the liquor traffic breeds fifty-two per cent. of the pauperism of Manchester. Is it probable that similar investigation in this country would show any less activity in beer and whisky as producing agents? Who says that saloons add nothing to the country?

"YE fearful hearts fresh courage take."

Some people have been afraid Iowa prohibition would perish by the way after all, for lack of sufficient penalties. For the fourth time, however, the legislature has risen to explain its unequivocal position on the question, and the last expression has certainly been plain and explicit enough to suit everybody but those liable to penalty. By its provision any person manufacturing intoxicating liquors prohibited by law, shall for the first offense be fined $200 and costs, or suffer six months' imprisonment; for the second and every subsequent offense the penalty shall not be less than $500 and may be $1,000. Any person selling or giving away intoxicating liquors prohibited by law, shall be fined on first offense not less than $50, or imprisonment till fine and costs are paid, and for each succeeding violation of law, shall be fined $300 or six months' imprisonment. These penalties apply in both cases to offenses committed by the servants, agents or clerks of the manufacturer or seller. The landlord comes in also for a fine of not less than $1,000 for his share in the illegal manufacture or sale. Club rooms, for liquor sale or distribution, and their members are fined by the law not less than $100 each, and express and railroad companies transporting liquors for illegal sale, the same on each offense; the meanest citizen may lay hold upon such liquors on cars, wagons, or wherever found in transitu and proceed against the offender in any court of any county. Iowa means business.

WAS the Cincinnati riot a legitimate monster?

Yes.

How so?

Well, it had all the earmarks its parents have for ages inflicted upon all their offspring; and they have long been wedded in wickedness strictly according to law.

Who were its parents?

Whisky and beer, of course.

Why "of course"?

Because—because—well, it doesn't admit of argument. Can you see any chance to work a sober crowd up to a blood-thirsty pitch against law and bayonets?

No.

Could anything but liquor keep a crowd in fighting frenzy forty-eight hours, securing a murder for each hour?

Of course not.

Did you ever hear of a great riot that didn't have the army of hard drinkers on its side?

Never.

Did you ever hear of a great riot in a city whose people preached prohibition and practiced total abstinence?

The idea is ridiculous; it can't be done.

WE are not given to recounting the horrors of intemperance. They are too ghastly, too piteous to wring hearts with very often, but the "cry of the children" will not "down." Our good friend, Laura Haviland was recently invited to speak in a small Michigan town where lived a German who was kind and industrious, save when under the influence of drink. At such times, in demoniac rage, the butcher knife or whatever came to his hand, was used in driving his wife and children into the street.

He came home in this condition one night to find his little daughter of nine years in the burning heat of scarlet fever, and to turn all out of doors. The pleadings of the heart sick mother and the sympathizing children were of no avail.

"I'll take care of 'er; I'll cool 'er off;" was his brutal threat, and suiting action to word, he seized a pail of cold water fresh from the well, stripped off the blankets, and dashed the water over the sick child, who was thrown into convulsions at once. The agonized mother strove with him still, but still he raved,

"I'll bring 'er out of this," and taking up a bottle of camphor setting near the bed side, threw a handful of the burning liquid upon the little face so dear to him, when whisky was not his indwelling fiend. The poor child gasped once—twice—and God in His mercy took her to His arms. An indignant community tried to administer justice, but he compelled his terror stricken family to testify falsely and so another murderer is free. The true fatherly heart trembles with honest anger at such savagery, but fathers legalized the saloon where this father was crazed. Will not the blood of this little one cry out against them also, and be required at their hands?

THE W. C. T.U. of Cincinnati, quick to discern causes of the recent scenes of horror and bloodshed passed these resolutions and called for a day of prayer before the fires of the commune had died away:

Resolved, That, in view of the great calamity that has befallen our city, we set apart next Wednesday for an all-day meeting of fasting and prayer that the Almighty may stay His hand of justice upon our city.

Resolved, That, deploring the conditions which led to the riot in this city, we will do all in our power to remedy them, and we demand that henceforth our Sabbath shall be protected from desecration.

Resolved, That with the new-made graves before us, of our brothers who have fallen by the hand of lawless violence, and the helpless condition of other wounded brothers in our midst as incentives, we renew our zeal both in prayer and effort to put down wrong in our midst, and we call upon all who are on the Lord's side to assist in our efforts.

Resolved, That we extend our heartfelt sympathy to the wives, mothers and sisters so sadly bereaved.

Even the saloon keepers—a few of them—felt the dreadful, direful responsibility of their destructive calling during this reign of terror and voluntarily closed their doors against rioters who were shouting promises of new horrors: "Only wait till tonight when we are good and drunk." In this emergency it is reserved to the little body which has for ten years faithfully flung out the white banner of peace, to cry, "To your tents, oh Israel."

A STORY OF THE FRONTIER.

BY CAROLINE M. MAY.

The harvest work was done:
We stretched ourselves 'long side the stacks
And watched the setting sun.
Brought from some nook of secret store
Known to our friend who worked the ore,—
The miner's pard—as phrases run—
The whisky glass, with loving smacks
Now to our lips commends.
As Jack and Jim the smuggler raise
High to their lips with words of praise,
Old Aleck sits aloof, nor seems
To notice aught, as lost in dreams.
With eager haste
They urge a taste,
"No," he replies, "I cannot drink.
My word is given to her I love.
Could I so grieve her would you think
As from that holy promise shrink?"
With low'ring looks and cold regard
And then with words to him more hard
The true old man they scorn.
"Hold mates a bit—my story hear—
Then if ye will or if ye dare
Urge me my words to spurn.—
The sun has twenty times made green
The slopes to yonder mountain lake
Since I, a youngster with my Jean,
My sister, sought these wilds to make
Our fortune, with our all at stake.
Alert and swift I took the eye
Of one who kept a tavern nigh
Known as the Golden Gate.
No deviltry was then so high,
No revelry was then so late,
But I my part could take.
I shared his labors, shared his gains,
For profit then I spared no pains.
The memory now gives me shame
Whose ready wit then fanned the flame
Of whisky's noxious fires.
But woe to me when his desires
Upon my sister fell,
And he would court her for his wife
To bring her to that hell.
Ah, well! it came to pass one night—
One night that darkens all my life—
A twelve month's bride was she—
The Golden Gate was full of light
The fiddles rang out merrily—
The decks were out, the betting high,
When looking up my Jean I spy
Soft gliding through the hall
On some small household errand bent
Straight to her husband him to call.
One anxious glance before her sent Assured me, it was plain to see—
The liquor would his master be.
With staggering steps he followed near,
The girl whom once he thought so dear.
Sharp grew the play
The dance more gay.
And loud the calls for whisky straight
When in the pauses of the games,
Came in the thud—thud, which I hate.
The noise of blows upon the brute,
An echo which all nature shames—
Can heav'n be deaf as they are mute?
Old Farly stood beside me then,
He winked. I cried 'a bucking jade
Some man doth ride—a dashing blade!'
'You bet!' said he, and played the ten
Which won the game. Just then
The cry 'the Vigilants are out!'
Was heard. The cards were dashed to ground
The music petered out.
For every one had heard the sound
And rushed to help the rout.
I gathered up the scattered decks
Put out the lights with care,
Then sauntered home with naught to vex
Glad that my bonnie Jean was there.
The room was dark—the fire was out
Where was my Jean? A match I struck
There in a corner as I feared
A tumbled heap of stuff appeared.
My heart stood still, for 'twas my luck
Just such a sight to find before.
'Jean! Jean!' I cried when a faint moan
Told me that life at least was there.
I lifted her with many a groan
And bore her tenderly to where
The low roof made a chamber bare,
It showed e'en then her woman's care.
E'en in that hour of sickning dread
I marked the whiteness of the spread,
The pillow beaten soft and light,
The small glass o'er the stand, so bright.
I saw myself, poor haggard wretch,
Seeking some water Jean to fetch.
I hardly know what next I did;
I bathed her till each quivering lid
Proclaimed that thought and grief were come;
Then in a rage that made me dumb
I sought the nearest house for friends.
Care-burdened yet warm-hearted, they Followed me swift my homeward way;
Each one his best assistance lends.
There on the bed my Jennie lay
Limp as a rag—her dear form sick
Nigh unto death, from blows that flay.
All night they met her every need;
The long red welts, the wounds that bleed,
They bind or bathe with tenderest heed.
Toward morn a feeble wail arose,
An infant's cry. The mother, blind
Although she was from many blows,
Smiled faint. 'Tell Tim I want him, dear,
He'll laugh to know the kid is here,'
She said. Three days she lingered near
Unto death's door; her poor breast scarred,
Beyond all nature's uses marred;
Then without warning sank to rest,
The baby sleeping on her breast."
A silence fell upon the group
And then indignant feeling stirs.
"How said the doctors that she died?"
"By natural causes they decide."
"Could men to such a falsehood stoop?"
"Oh, yes! and our best customers."
"The father—was there nothing said?"
"A reckless man—his threat was dread.
What use? our judge a drunken sot,
What justice would or could be got?
Well, mates, my little story's done,
Now do you wonder that I shun
The glass of whisky as I would
The venom of the viper's brood?"

AT $50, VICE; AT $500, VIRTUE.

BY JAMES CLEMENT AMBROSE.

A few topers, many newspapers, most politicians, and lots of preachers declare in the language that "speaks louder than words," that the $50 license breeds vice, the $500 license begets virtue; that the $50 license so taints the whisky it is pinned to that ignorance, poverty, tears, brutality, murder and ravishment become its cruel whelps, but the $500 license compels the devil to come out of whisky and run violently down a steep place into the sea, leaving its progeny the children of "sweetness and light," its consumers only "sucking doves;" that $50 drinks, are degradation, $500 drinks, respectability; that a $50 saloon is a doggery; a $500 saloon the trysting-place of gentlemen; that of the $50 glass men drink to excess, but let go the $500 glass before it heaves a brick to their hat; that $50 snakes kill the poor man, and devour the loaf and the love of his household, but the $500 anaconda turns over all that man's earnings to his family, and gorges itself only on the pocket-books of wealth and the brains of wise men, who can stand a few fresh coils of the squeezer every day, yet get out and walk off before they die of "heart disease." In other words, many good men in bad company by toiling for high license, tell themselves the lie that arsenic at $50 a dose is deadly poison, at $500 a dose the best of baking powder. Funny that women never fall in love with this high-priced luxury!

I am not arguing the case—axioms need none; I have simply translated the conduct of the high license heretics into plain Anglo Saxon. That is, the professed friends of temperance who walk up and stroke the golden calf branded "high license" are heretics, but against their will, they don't see the horns of the beast—think they've sawed them off. The only orthodox temperance, is total abstinence—prohibition. Permission for pay is heterodoxy; and the higher the bribe the higher the crime of its acceptance. Indeed, the intelligent who stand by consenting to see the Stephen of Sobriety stoned, today are men whose name is Saul-clothes-holder to the saloon keepers—persecuting temperance, and styling their act "In the name of the Lord." But if they die not quickly, as they go "on their way to Damascus," a great light shall shine round about them, the scales shall fall from their eyes, and they shall inherit a new name, refusing longer to be called the Tools of Liquor-selling.

And in proof that the Illinois worshipers of their present $500 dalliance with the gin-shop have not sinned without light, I mention a few of the scores of towns in this state that, under local option, have long tried to tame the tiger by charging him $500 to $1,000 for a year's lodging within the fold of their lambs. During February and March, I visited them, among many other towns, and have my information from the most reliable sources.

Odell, a village about 1,000 strong, tried $500 license without sobering off, then rose to $750, and the annual income of its three saloons rose to $30,000, a neat balance of $27,750 in favor of the saloons, and against the people, with no perceptible loss of crime over the time of low license. And this wealth of taxation voted upon the homes by the help of church members who think the saloons are paying their taxes. In the course of a lecture there I touched upon the crime of Christian votes for social vices, and one professed brother complimented me with the after remark that I ought to be lynched.

Taylorville lived five years without license or saloon. But the good grew careless, and the bad grew wily and dry; a license board crept in. But to keep things "respectable and taxes light," they said $1,000, and no curtains to hide shame, no chairs to loaf in. Yet two saloons have found this barefaced investment very profitable, the people find their taxes enjoying a vigorous growth, and the former quiet of their streets enlivened by that hum and activity only saloons know how to awaken, and the calaboose how to quell. It was here a dignified lady visited the polls with tickets in the interest of woman suffrage. There a laboring man accosted her:

"Please, ma'am, won't you read my ticket for me?"

"Oh yes," she replied; "but perhaps you'd like to vote mine?"

"What's your's for?"

"The ballot for women."

"Oh no, I can't go that, ma'am; women doesn't know enough to vote."

Medora, two tap-rooms at $500 each, one for three hundred men, women and children; and few but a small union of women with manhood enough to assault them.

Pana did indulge in nine $500 jug fountains; but the ladies and a pastor whose theology is prohibitory as well as promissory, Rev. I. W. Higgs, threw stones against those jugs till they closed them, emptied the "jug;" and today that city has better street crossings and lamp posts, and thereon no spatters of brother's blood.

Chandlerville, three saloons at $500 each, but no fewer red noses, ruined fortunes and spoiled sons among her romantic hills than when her partnership interest in saloons represented less money.

But the growth of local prohibition is very encouraging. At Virden, Edinburg, Newton, Piasa, Mt. Carroll and other towns I found no public license to private robbery; and one presiding elder told me that of the twenty-four towns in his district twenty-one had prohibition—a democratic district too. So it is not a question of local politics. Count Chicago into Lake Michigan, submit prohibition clear of politics, and Illinois would today welcome her regeneration with stout majority. Nor does any candid man now overlook the achievements of the temperance women of the state in the creation of this actual and growing majority.

And after entertainment within the homes of the union he who croaks in my ear the chronic slur that women who talk and work for the salvation of all homes neglect their own, shall find his ungrateful censure corrected by the gentle facts.

WHAT SOME YOUNG WOMEN'S UNIONS ARE DOING.

BY LUCIA E. F. KIMBALL.

The Chicago Young Woman's Christian Temperance Unions have so often been held up as ideal societies I fear the impression prevails that they are exempt from the difficulties and discouragements which are so much the common lot of temperance organizations. A brief chapter from their experience may serve as a comfort and help to others.

The day after I reached home from Iowa was dark and stormy, just the kind to make delightful, after three months of constant travel, sitting down before one's own grate oblivious of railway trains or meeting engagements. Nothing of ordinary importance would have induced me to forego the luxury of staying at home. But among the letters, notes and postals waiting to be read was a little message asking me to come to a two hours' prayer meeting to be held at the headquarters of the Y. W. C. T. U. of the West Side. I learned in addition that the society was very much discouraged, some of its members having left the city and others being kept from active work by home cares and illness. Moreover no one of their number could be found willing to accept the office of president and the meeting was called specially to pray that some leader might be given them It was a most fitting thing to do and everyone was, I think, strengthened by that season of waiting upon God. At its close I felt constrained to remind the young ladies of the common sense woman who said, "I never ask God to do any thing for me without asking also how I can help Him answer my prayer." An after meeting was called to elect a president and I found as one after another gave her reason for not serving that there was serious difficulty in the way. Miss Carrie Dale, who had served most faithfully and efficiently, was overtaxed as the finances of the society had been managed largely by her. Miss Helen Gardner, the first president was absent from the meeting on account of illness. It was decided to elect her president and a committee appointed to call on her and induce her to serve.

Her final answer when she accepted the office is an index of the spirit which governs our Y. W. C. T. Unions. She said: "If I had been asked to decide in this matter before that meeting of prayer I should have positively refused: but I look upon that as very sacred, and this request coming as a result of that seems to be of the Lord and I feel I must accept it and do the best I can."

The union seems now to have now not only a new lease of life, but of courage and strength as well.

Its chief burden is the support of the free kindergarten at the expense of $75 a month. Kindly gifts of money have come in of late, which have greatly encouraged them. The young gentlman, honorary members are arranging for a lecture by Mr. Wendling, early in March. Union Park Congregational church kindly gives its spacious audience room for this purpose. This Sunday school and young ladies' missionary society has also recently given then $50 for the kindergarten work. A social was held at our home Friday evening Feb. 15, which was pronounced one of the most delightful of the many pleasant gatherings. It was profitable financially as well. One gentleman, not a member, but an invited friend, as he was passing out handed the treasurer $25 and the new members secured added $5 to this.

The feature of the evening was Anna Gordon's charming talk which appeared to me the most effective parlor presentation of temperance work to young people I have ever heard. She speaks to young women as a young woman, and the gentlemen were equally enthusiastic in their expressions of appreciation.

Our Chicago Kitchen Garden association has furnished the society with an outfit for a class of twenty-four (which expense the Y. W. C. T. U. could not have incurred) and under the lead of Miss Gardner, who took the lessons last fall a class is to be started Saturday, March 1.

This as well as the free kindergarten may be visited at their pleasant rooms 334 W. Randolph street.

A boys' meeting is held Saturday evening.

According to our faith and works will it be unto us.

SHORT TEMPERANCE TALKS.

BY MISS C. S. BURNETT.

No. 4.—The Do Nothings.

In this age of the world when the great contest is raging for the supremacy of right over wrong, 'tis sad to find a great army who have been justly termed the "do nothings." Mr. Do-nothing always has a great many excuses to offer for his indifference on the temperance question. One is, "The liquor traffic will not hurt me if I let it alone." Let us see. Are you aware that your taxes are doubled every year by the sale of liquor? Just see the expense incurred from the necessity of police and criminal courts. Look at our jails and asylums. Think of our paupers and the vagrants found in every city. Whisky is accountable for all of these. But you may suffer still more. There is that son of yours just budding into manhood. These dealers in drink already have an eye on him. Yes, and he has taken the first step. Take care! the traffic may hurt you more than you think. When you see him with bloodshot eyes, unstrung nerves, a ruined reputation, then you will say, when too late, "It has hurt me." Again, Mr. Do-nothing says, "I do not drink; I do not favor the traffic in drink; that is enough; I have no influence over other people; I cannot prevent others drinking; so there is no use in my worrying anything about it; I don't see any use in your temperance organizations or speeches. Men always have drank and they always will, so you might just as well mind your own business; you can't stop it, and I am not going to try. This question has no business in politics and I will sustain my party anyhow. I never have done anything to help either side and I never will."

Well! that is quite a speech. I wonder how much truth there is in it. You have no influence you say. I pity you then. What a mere cipher you must be! But you deceive yourself. You have influence, and that influence is given to the wrong side. It is barely possible that you are unconscious of the fact; but you ought to know that the time has come when even indifference is actual aid to the enemy. A foe is invading your homes. Will you sit idly by and say, "I have nothing to do about it"? Remember "he that is not for is against." The temperance cause needs your help and you have no right to withhold it. Then you are mistaken when you say the traffic in intoxicating liquor cannot be stopped. It can and will. So surely as God overthrew the slave system will He bring to naught this greater curse to our land. Men will always drink, just as they will always murder and steal but it shall be in violation of law. O that some one could arouse your slumbering consciences and show you that you have no right to vote for one who is not pledged to prohibition. This question DOES belong to politics, and by politicians, goaded on to the work by persistent efforts of Christian people, will it yet be solved.

I am sorry to say the "do nothings" are yet found in the pulpit. Shame of the minister who has not the moral courage to condemn vice, even if found in his own pews! No man ever yet lost in the end by being true to his convictions. When our ministers do their duty in the pulpit and at the polls the end is not far off.

Next to the pulpit comes the press as a factor in moulding public sentiment. I am glad to note the bold stand taken by the prohibitionists is bringing our editors to their senses, and they are finding the time has come when the sentiments of the Christian people of our land can no longer be slighted. Conscience has a stronger hold on them than party lines, and they will act as it teaches if the party of "great moral ideas" does lose an election or two before it dares to speak out boldly for prohibition.

Strange as it may seem, in view of all that woman has suffered, the do nothings are not all men. How any woman can sit at ease while her own children are being borne on in this current of sin, soon to reach the vortex of destruction, is something I cannot understand. How dead the heart must be!

Though woman cannot vote on this question she can mould the conscience of the nation and make men vote as she wishes. If this traffic is not stopped the sin will rest largely on her shoulders. O sisters, think of your responsibility. "Why stand ye here idle?" The harvest is white; join the faithful laborers, and soon the shout of victory will roll all over our fair land.

SCIENTIFIC TEMPERANCE TEACHING IN PUBLIC SCHOOLS.

BY MARY TILDEN M'CALL.

Read at the W.C.T.U. Convention of Calif[illegible].

To prevent is infinitely easier and infinitely better always than to reform. Labor as we may, there can but little be done, comparatively, to save the confirmed drunkard. God pity him! the slave of a horrible appetite; a demon which holds him in its relentless grasp, torturing and tormenting to the bitter end Sadly heart-rending, yet is it too terribly true that the majority of the world's vast army of inebriates of today must surely go down to dishonored graves. helpless and hopeless wrecks. To save the young, then, is the great and important work to be done in the line of temperance, and it is in their interest that we would briefly speak. Legally enforced scientific temperance teaching in every normal school and public school and every other institution of learning throughout the length and breadth of our land we believe would be one of the most effective and powerful instrumentalities that could be brought to bear to forever avert from the young the perilous evils and temptations leading to intemperance which now beset them on every hand. The march of this grand forward movement has already commenced. In Vermont, New Hampshire, Michigan and New York laws have been passed placing among the required studies in schools, "physiology and hygiene, which shall give special prominence to the effects of alcoholic drinks upon the human system," and further requiring that all teachers be examined in these as in other necessary studies. A similar law, though we would go a step further, and include narcotics as well as alcoholic stimulants, is possible in every state, possible here in our beautiful state of California, but to secure its enactment, making the teaching of temperance principles compulsory, there must first be an education of public opinion on this question. With this then, as inevitably as day follows night, there will come in the end a demand for legislative action, for a law which shall embody the crystallized sentiment of the people in behalf of that which appertains to the best interests and well being of their children. Thus to mould public opinion in favor of so great and salutary a measure as universal temperance education, means to agitate, setting forth principles, showing the reasonableness of the cause and winning adherents by reason of the divine attractiveness of truth and right. And above all let us not forget that it means work for every friend of temperance, not fitful and spasmodic, but continuous and persistent work—work in many and varied directions, work in which all may cordially "lend a hand," and help on until the gracious object sought is finally achieved. While we believe that the education of the children, the boys and girls everywhere, in temperance principles is a measure than which there is none exceeding it in importance and a far-reaching moral power for good, we also believe that there is no temperance issue, which with tact and judgment can be so speedily consummated as this for saving the youth of our country. The sturdy young giant, Prohibition—already a terror to the liquor traffic—has yet mighty battles to fight and win. The ballot, "the white thunder" in the hands of woman is a power in the future, gradually to be evolved from the world's broader thought and grander purposes. But prohibition and the ballot for woman— correlative terms as we had almost said—include political issues and hence parties and party spirit. But here is a measure looking only to the education of the young in regard to the hygienic effect of certain poisons upon the human system, a measure so reasonable, so just and sensible, so free from all entanglements with controverted and controversial subjects that all alike, conservative and radical, prohibitionist and anti-prohibitionist, woman suffragist and anti-woman suffragist, democrat and republican and everybody can harmoniously unite And without the least fear, either, of ever being considered that frightful bugbear to not a few most excellent people—a temperance fanatic—in thus giving to so wise a law their countenance and support. And now, will we not here, in this convention of our honored and beloved State Woman's Christian Temperance Union, take up this subject in earnest, of introducing scientific teaching, both as to the effects of alcoholic stimulants and narcotics into the normal schools and public schools of our state? Are we not ready, every one of us, to pledge our influence, heart and soul,—our efforts, in season and out of season, if need be, to secure the attainment of this that shall tell so grandly, so gloriously, for the physical and moral uplifting of the succeeding generations to come after us? Never was there a truer saying than this, that "in union there is strength." Individually, the greatest even, is but a unit, a factor of limited influence, but the aggregation of individual influence, oh, what mighty force! What transcendent power can there not then be brought to bear in any given direction, for the accomplishment of any given purpose? Simply, then, would we forward this movement for popularizing temperance education, we must organize for it, organize for a regular determined campaign, in a business-like, systematic, thorough going manner, in order that every effort put forth by every worker may be utilized and turned to the highest and best possible account. The last advice of a great journalist, Samuel Bowles, to a talented young friend of his, was: "Would you succeed in life, remember this, 'don't scatter,'" a curt admonition, embodying a truth of the widest application, and which we, in our temperance work, shall do well to heed, lest we unduly delay the hour of our final victory.

Report was given in a current number of The Union Signal, the official organ of the National W. C. T. U., and by the way, one of the ablest temperance journals anywhere published, and which we can but heartily wish were in the hands of every woman in the land, in this report of the New York convention referred to the line of work marked out, centred strongly upon the introduction of scientific temperance teaching into the normal and public schools of the state. Resolutions were passed for the appointment of a state superintendent to co-operate with the national superintendent of this department of work, and also for the appointment of local superintendents of every union within the limits of the state, the business of all of which officers should be to keep this all important question constantly before the public, calling in to their aid everywhere the influence of the pulpit and the press, and every other available agency that would inure to help on the beneficent work to its final consummation.

Whatever methods in the wisdom of this convention, whether these mentioned or others shall be deemed the best and the most feasible to adopt for the compassing of this same object—compulsory temperance education, here in the far golden state, one thing is certain, there must in some way emanate from all our local unions "Light more light," as was Goethe's exclamation in his last moments, upon this most vital question—the question as it seems to us together with that of the ballot for women and prohibition—pre-eminently of the day and hour.

As we look back upon the labors of the California branch of the Woman's Christiam Temperance Union for the last two years, in connection with the prize temperance essay writing, effected through the generous offer of Dr. MacDonald, and under its auspices so successfully conducted in the public schools of San Francisco and in the state normal school here at San Jose, in view of this noble work accomplished, does it not come home to the thought of every one that this has been to lead up and to prepare the way for the consideration of the deeper problem, of how, through the inherent majesty of law (for nothing but law will accomplish the work,) to provide for the scientific temperance education —not of the few—but tor every child and youth, poor or rich, low or high, black or white, within the borders of this great state. We all remember the oft quoted words of Shakspeare,

"There is a tide in the affairs of men
Which taken at the flood, leads on to fortune."

Translated into plain prose is to emphasize the fact, that success in any enterprise depends greatly upon under-undertaking it at precisely the right and fitting moment. And is not the present the auspicious time, of all others, for us to inaugurate this educational work, in the behest of our common humanity; in the interest of the young—the state's proudest heritage, the brightest jewels in its crown of glory. Here almost within the very shadow of one of California's grandest and most influential public institutions—the state normal school—and that other noble institution—the Pacific university—under the jurisdiction of that church which stands the wide country over (the Methodist church, it is unnecessary to say) in the fore front of aggressive temperance organizations, could we not bespeak the potent influence of these institutions of learning in the very outset in behalf of this measure, and can we but believe that they would splendidly rally to its support? And soon how marked the advance, how telling the work for good that should be wrought. We can only say, God speed the day when innocent childhood and winsome girlhood, when brave boyhood and young manhood, shall all succeed to such education in the physiological and hygienic principles of temperance as shall be to them in maturer years, a safeguard against the use of deleterious poisons whose main office, in connection the one with the other, is but to debase and destroy. A word in conclusion: For one we have an invincible faith in the doctrine that "whatever ought to happen is going to happen." So surely shall there not a single phase of the temperance cause fail at last. Though the battle waged be a long and weary one, let us take heart. Our all loving Heavenly Father is in the work and for the work, and by and by—in the nearer future it may be then we think—victory, triumphant victory awaits, "For God and Home and Native Land" forever,

TRANS-CONTINENTAL LETTERS—NO. I.

Dear Union Signal.—Out of an overflowing heart I write you. This state is all ablaze with enthusiasm in our holy cause. The municipal elections of many cities occurred yesterday and prohibition, or perhaps enforcement of law, was a prominent issue. In Denver, the Chicago of the new west, the fight was a clean, square issue between prohibition and the Citizen's Protective Union—the saloon keepers' association—and the victory for prohibition was decisive. All the aldermen but two, endorsed by the liquor dealers, were defeated, and this morning look in each other's faces with utter consternation.

The campaign was a short, sharp one, largely organized and generated by Rev. Geo. P. Hays, D. D., pastor of the Central Presbyterian church.

The women of the W. C. T. U. were at the polls with coffee and lunch, while others kept the fire burning and the incense ascending from the altars of the sanctuaries. I have been in many campaigns, have been on the field at the eve of many battles, but I have never looked into the faces of more determined men or consecrated women than were these aggressive and now triumphant warriors.

I send the Te Deum which they are singing this morning as found in the Denver Daily News:

A TEMPERANCE TE DEUM.

Rev. George P. Hays, chairman of the temperance committee, last night issued the following proclamation:

To all the People of Denver:—In behalf of the lovers of good order, quiet homes and a pure public service, we send you greetings. We have fleshed our maiden sword and know the metal of which our forces are made up. We started in this campaign without the slightest idea that we could elect any one, or even make a close race. Without any records of previous elections, or time for anything approximating a thorough canvass, our battle, under leaders of no political experience, has yet elected aldermen in two wards, and in others secured the office in the hands of able and pure men, while in others, men whose record is a stench in the nostrils of all decency have been invited to retire from the public gaze to the most obscure places of private life. We have shown beyond controversy that those who desire good government are in a decided majority in our noble city. The Liquor Dealers' association have succeeded in leaving their men safely at home by a goodly majority with one exception. We call such a result, under the circumstances, a wonderful victory for us. Now, once more for our altars and our fires. The nomination of good men can always be made to win if there is an earnest, aggressive campaign. Let all good men and women take heart, and let the fallen look up. They have God's sympathy and ours. Success is in easy reach. "Praise God, from whom all blessings flow." George P. Hays.

Chairman of Committee of Twenty-five.

I have spoken thus far in Colorado Springs on Sunday night, Denver Monday, and Pueblo, Tuesday. We are now en route to Santa Fe; shall speak in Albuquerque, New Mexico, on Friday, and then go on to Los Angeles. At Deming, N. M., I meet my old friend and traveling companion, Miss Sarter, whom some of the ladies will remember. Our address will be Los Angeles for the next month.

I must not forget that when passing through Kansas last week we stopped over a day at Topeka and had a pleasant and very satisfactory interview with Hon. Miller, mayor of the city. There is now not an open saloon in the city, and the places of clandestine sale are being fast closed.

At Atchison also the mayor has been served with the writ of quo warranto to appear before the supreme court and show cause why the city receives a revenue from liquor saloons.

In the language of the local reporter, "The jig is up with the business in Kansas."

Yours sincerely, J. Ellen Foster.

THE BOTTOM LINE OF TFMPERANCE.

Dear Union Signal:—The view of the mince-pie question presented by a writer in the issue of this journal for March 13 is worthy of profoundest consideration. It goes to the very foundation of temperance principles. And the work of the W. C. T. U. must go as deep as that, else the generations of women who shall succeed us will have just the same vices and wretchedness to contend with as characterize the Christian civilization of today.

To shut up dram-shops and induce men to abstain from drinking alcoholic beverages, is a great thing, a glorious thing. But what if these men must still carry with them through life the torment of craving appetites?

And what if our young men as they come upon the stage of action, have in them that morbidness of taste which is ever seeking gratification, and makes it difficult to resist temptation?

Every benevolent heart must rejoice that some of the states provide that the children shall be instructed as to the nature of alcohol and its effects on the human system; but what if they have induced in their systems a state of preparation which demands alcoholic or other stimulating drinks?

Genuine temperance is not in outward things. It is an inward condition. It does not consist in prohibition of drink, nor in abstinence from drink by force of will, while the man suffers from unnatural thirst. It consists in a condition of the system so clean and wholesome, that there is no craving of appetite, no desire for drink which is not readily satisfied by the beverage which generous nature supplies.

O that every earnest temperance worker, that every Christian mother, might be brought under conviction of the truth that to teach the young that alcohol is a poison, and that in any sort of mixture whatever, it tends to ruin whoever drinks of it, is but half the work; that the teachings of righteousness must be supported by a training which makes the person strong to do the right. The injunction to train up a child in the way he should go, is pregnant with the most sacred truth. But that child is not righteously trained who is fed on mince-pie, though it have not a particle of alcohol in it. All mince-pie should be seasoned with alcohol; that is to say, there is a legitimate connection between the two, for both are directly calculated to pervert the natural instincts and beget a morbid appetite in whoever partakes of them.

It is the unintermitting endeavor, the ceaseless study of housekeepers to gratify the palate by an endless variety of rich and complicated dishes, and exciting condiments, and the effect of these upon the delicate mucous membranes, and upon the blood and general tissues and nerves of those who eat them, is to lay the foundation of intemperance and drunkenness.

This may be a startling assertion, but if it is so, it is because we are not taught and trained in the truths of physiology and hygiene. These sciences demonstrate that foods in their simpler forms of preparation best sustain the human system in health and power of endurance, and that all excitants tend to physical disturbance, derangement, and demoralization, and that close to these lie mental and moral disorder and debility.

The Christian temperance women of America have begun grandly in incorporating into their work a department of physiology and hygiene. If they will follow on to know the whole truth in this matter the beneficent results of their labors will go beyond their most sanguine expectations.

I do not forget that I am pledged to give your readers a description of the wet sheet pack, and I hope soon to redeem my word. Harriet N. Austin.

WORK AMONG LUMBERMEN.

Dear Union Signal:—For many years the vast pineries of the northwest have attracted the capital and enterprise of the eastern and middle states. The woods of Michigan, Wisconsin and of other states ring with the sound of the woodman's axe, and the reports of the trade show that more than one billion dollars' worth of lumber has been marketed in the state of Michigan alone. It is easily understood that so enormous a business keeps great numbers of men employed. The nature of their work takes them from their families and from all the privileges of the gospel for a large part of the year. The men live in camps during the winter, from thirty to one hundred in a camp. In the spring they come to the cities and villages where they are made the easy prey of the saloon keeper and of the woman whose feet take hold on death. Saloon business pays well enough in spring to enable hundreds, yes, thousands of these dens to flourish through the year.

No chaplains are employed for this class of men as for the soldiers; no bethels are established for them as for the seamen, and because the wheat has not been sown weeds and briars cover the field. The moral and spiritual destitution of the woodmen and the evils resulting from it are appalling. They are felt in city and town, poisoning the moral atmosphere as might be expected.

Local unions sought in vain to do something to check the streams of intemperance and immorality which at certain seasons overflowed all bounds. They were told that this class of men could not be reached, and that any expenditure of time or money in that direction would be wasted.

But this terrible condition of things touched the heart of Wm. F. Davis, a minister of the gospel from Chelsea, Mass., while spending a few weeks in Michigan four years ago, and he determined to undertake a mission to the woodmen. Without money or friends to back him, trusting in God only, he entered upon this work.

When great things are accomplished people are apt to admire the hero; but when he begins the work he is usually met with discouragement, if not with open animosity and derision. The limits of this article forbid giving Mr. Davis' experience in this line. But it may give us pleasure to know that from the first the W. C. T. Unions had faith in the woodmen's mission and prayed for the missionary, which was all we then thought we could do.

Mr. Davis a year later organized the Lumbermen's Missionary Association, and worked with it one season. When at their first annual meeting the association voted to strike the word Christian from their constitution, he severed his connection with them, and has since then carried on the work vigorously, with mission headquarters in East Saginaw, Mich., where meetings are held nightly for the benefit of woodmen in the city and where they are made welcome on their return from the camps.

At the last annual meeting of the National W. C. T. U. in Detroit the importance of the work was brought before the convention in a brief address by Mr. Davis. Since then Mrs. Evelyn N. Peters, of Manistee has been appointed National Superintendent of Work among Lumbermen. This lady has been for some time actively engaged in Christian work for woodmen and has peculiar fitness for this work.

After earnest prayer and deliberation Mrs. Peters decided that under existing circumstances the W. C. T. U. can work most effectively by making appointments for Mr. Davis to address union meetings at which collections for the work shall be taken, these collections to be credited to the W. C. T. U. and given to Mr. Davis for the work.

It may be well to state here that Mr. Davis uses for himself and family only such funds as are given him for this especial purpose, and accounts for all sums committed to him in a printed monthly report.

Mr. Davis is a man of vast intellectual resources, and yet of apostolic simplicity; an excellent gospel preacher and a brilliant lecturer. (He may be also engaged for evangelistic meetings and Bible readings in connection with the work for the lumbermen.)

Let no one think that this work is local. The eastern and middle states should be as much interested as Michigan and Minnesota, and the work be carried on with faith and vigor.

This lengthening of the cords and strengthening of the stakes, this laying hold of the deep underlying causes of demoralization will show that the work of the W. C. T. Union is rooted in Christ. He is our Leader, to whom all power is given in heaven and on earth. While we are working for prohibition and franchise let us lift high above all, the banner of our Lord, knowing that "this is the victory that overcometh the world, our faith." Emma Obenauer.

TEMPERANCE AND SCHOOL SUFFRAGE IN CONNECTICUT.

Dear Union Signal:—On the occasion of a recent hearing the legislative committee gave the people on temperance suffrage for women, one gentleman said, "The temperance men of the state have done their level best for the last sixty years to destroy the evils of intemperance and failed; now let the women help." Another said: "Woman is the natural enemy of the liquor trade and the liquor trade is the natural enemy of woman; they are natural and eternal enemies, for God's sake cut the bands off the hands that would fight this enemy; his hands are not tied." And yet the present legislature decides to leave their hands tied.

March 26th, in the hall of Representatives they voted by a large majority not to allow women the right to vote in towns on the sale of intoxicating drinks, and not to allow them to vote in school districts for the election of any officers, nor be eligible to any office in such district, by a vote of ninety-five to eighty-three.

They gave one hour of their valuable time to the two bills, limiting members to five minute speeches, which was virtually cutting off all debate upon the subject. Day by day our papers publish the terrible accounts of women and children murdered and outraged by drunken men. Neither life nor property is safe in Connecticut, as the frequent shocking murders and robberies of the last year will testify. Every one knows that the traffic in alcoholic drinks is largely responsible for this state of disorder, theft and bloodshed, and the men of Connecticut will neither protect the women from its lawlessness, nor allow them weapons to protect themselves. They probably never looked upon themselves as in that position, but such is the fact. The only argument made, if it might be called an argument, against allowing women to vote on the school question, was, that it was an entering wedge for general suffrage, and the house was warned to consider the question with that in view.

The temperance question was voted upon without any hearty advocacy. For the educational bill more was said and one man, Mr. Morrison, of Enfield, filled his five minutes, when he was stopped by the speaker's gavel. He said a bill favored by the mothers, sisters and wives the state, was entitled to careful consideration; there should be no cowardly dodging the question.

Mr. Cook, of Stamford, and Mr. Range, of Guilford, spoke in favor of the temperance suffrage bill. Messrs. Morrison, of Enfield, Range, of Guilford, Jackson, of Derby, Glidden, of Mansfield, Horne, of Winchester, spoke for the bill for school suffrage.

On the bill to give women the right to vote in school districts, Mr. Cowles, of Manchester, offered an amendment that, "the poll of any person entitled to vote under provisions of this act shall be set in the tax list of the school district in which the person belongs, at one hundred dollars ($100) each." The amendment was lost.

Mr. Randall, of Vernon, offered an amendment that, "the bill do not take effect till the year 2184." The speaker threw it out. If the men who sent up these amendments had been trained in their youth to honor their father and their mother they should not have displayed such contempt for other men's mothers as is manifest in their amendments.

About one hundred young ladies of the Normal school of New Britain, nearly the whole school, with their teachers, came up to the capitol to be present at the discussion of these questions.

We have recently organized a temperance school in Hartford, about one hundred names. It promises to be a success. (We elect our officers in this school and are eligible to any office in the school.) Quite a number of ladies and several gentlemen are usually in the school besides what are required for teachers and we hope to form an adult class. It would be profitable many ways, add interest to the school, encourage the young scholars, and benefit the class. We arrange the classes after the manner of Sunday schools.

There is another temperance school of nearly as many scholars, in which temperance instruction is given by reading and other general exercices.

VERMONT IN THE VAN.

Dear Union Signal:—A letter was commenced to you February 29, but the severe illness of my dear sister, who came home from Wellesley, claimed my attention and care, and all my temperance work with its mute and urgent appeals has been under lock and key in my desk. The chamber of death cancels all other claims upon us. I have been called to give up my sweet young sister into whose life I had hoped to have builded so much. Those who have been anxiously awaiting replies to letters will excuse delay. I am quite recovered from my injuries and am greatly helped and comforted by the knowledge that the work is going so vigorously along; that new workers are coming to the front. The Spirit of God is among our workers; difficulties are disappearing; things once impossible now are easy. I wish I could give you a panoramic view of my Vermont sisters as they seem to me, arousing to a consciousness of their opportunities and their ability. The executive committee have ventured to present a plan for county institutes, which looked formidable, but knowing as I do that our women are equal to it, I am not surprised that "calls" for more of the plans reach me daily. Says one studious efficient V. P., "I have studied it more than I used to my problems in geometry." Another, "The best plan for county meetings we have had; I have assigned nearly all parts; I mean to make it a success." Two new unions have organized themselves, one at Waterbury and one at Powlet. Brondon has revived. An invitation has been received by me to go to a young ladies' school in Poultney and organize a Y. W. C. T. U. Our ladies are going out by twos and threes to help in the work, and so we mingle prayer and praise.

The new book ordered by the National Convention is very nearly ready. It is to be called the "Pathfinder for the Organization and Work of the W. C. T. U.

THE BROOK AND THE BLUEBIRD.

I heard such glad, sweet music,
That I stopped on my way to look;
There, close by the dusty highway,
Sparkled a little brook.

So joyous was its singing,
I could not help but say
"Pray, what has happened, brooklet,
That you sing so sweet today?"

"O such news I have to tell you!
Just now there flitted by,
And floated in the sunshine,
A bit of the great blue sky.

"And isn't it a blessing—
For I must stay, you see,
All hidden low in the grasses—
That the sky can come to me?"

—Good Cheer.

A LITTLE WOMAN.

She was a very little woman, not more than four years old, and I am afaid she was running away.

Perhaps I ought not to say running; for she walked gravely and deliberately along the street, looking about her with an observant air. She had on a ruffled white apron, and a brown stuff dress, and over her head she had thrown an apron of blue and white check in place of a bonnet. The apron was so large, and the little woman so small, that, while the chuboy hand held it snugly under her round chin, one corner trailed on the ground behind her. The apron also served as a shawl for a rag doll with no features to speak of, whose head, with a ghastly wound on top, peeped out under the little mother's arm. A great many people were coming and going, but the little woman did not notice them. She was singing to herself and the doll,

"'Tis His hand that leadeth me."

She only knew this one line, so she sang it over and over as she went on, walking close to the fences, and peeping into the yards where the flowers were growing, and into basements, where she had glimpses of tables covered with red cloths, and shining castors towering in the middle like revolving batteries. She was directly in the wake of a fat woman, who turned the stream of travel one side, and left a quiet little path for her small follower.

Presently the little woman stopped. She had come to a yard, filled with trees and flowers, around an old-flashioned brick house. The flowers were old-fiashioned, too, but they were all of the sweetest, and over them the cherry boughs were like one great white bouquet. The little woman forgot to hold the apron under her chin, and it slid down to the sidewalk. She took her doll from under her arm, and held her close to the fence that she might see too, and smell the blossoms, and hear the fine, clear piping of the bees at work among them. There was a wonderful bird flashing about the trees like a great golden blossom. The bird seemed always just about to launch into a song, but was so busy he broke off at the first syllable. A man came across the lawn with a wheelbarrow, in which was a green shrub. He dug a hole in the turf, and began to plant the bush; but he saw the eager little face, and the dolly with her woolen brains oozing out behind. He nodded good-naturedly.

"Where are you going, sis?"

"Anywhere," said the little woman.

"What you looking at?"

"God's flowers," was the grave answer.

The man laughed again, and pushed up his hat.

"Them's the Gov'nor's flowers; want some?"

The little woman only nodded, but her eyes grew large and round with wonder and expectancy as the man broke a white bough from the cherry-tree, and a purple spike of hyacinth bells. He put them in her hand, saying, "Now run home, or that there young lady will be took up by the p'lice; looks like she'd had a row."

The little woman had neither eyes nor ears for anything but the flowers. The man went back to his work, and she went slowly on. One block, two blocks, six blocks, then she came to a little triangular park at the intersection of the streets,—a very small park, with only grass and a few trees in it, and an iron drinking fountain for horses just outside the fence. Two dusty horses were drinking from the round iron bowl, and a dog was eagerly lapping the slender stream that spilled over upon the stones below. The little woman went into the park, and sat down under a tree. She was just beginning to be afraid she was lost, but she could not be very unhappy while she had her flowers. She sat very still looking at them, and to her great delight a brown bee came sniffing at the white cups for an instant as he passed. Stretched on the grass near her was a boy—a big boy; the little woman would have called him a man. He had red hands and a sunburned face, and coarse, clumsy clothes. You would not have looked twice at him, but the little woman looked and looked, and saw he was crying. She looked again, and then crept a little nearer, holding her doll very tight.

"Does you want some of God's flowers?" she asked, holding the sweet things toward him.

The boy took them eagerly,—took them all; but just as the little woman was going to cry he gave them back to her, so she broke off a piece of the cherry bough and one little stemless hyacinth, and gave them to him. The boy had but lately come to the city. He was hungry, he was friendless, he was utterly discouraged, he had taken the first step downward. But when he smelt the familiar scent of cherry blossoms, and saw the pure, pitiful eyes of the little woman looking at him, it brought back the homely brown house among the hills, and the little sisters who believed in him and trusted him.

"I'll try one day more," he said resolutely, "and if I can't get work, I'll go home; I won't stay here and go to the bad."

Surely they were "God's flowers" which the little woman had given him.

She sat quietly under the tree, talking sometimes to her doll, and counting the hyacinth bells over and over. She knew now that she was lost, but was not really frightened. She felt sure some one would come by and by and find her. The market-house clock began to strike twelve. With the first stroke a babel of sounds broke in. Steam-whistles in every key, bells that clanged slowly, bells that rang wildly, clocks striking from a dozen steeples, and through them all the slow deep boom of the market clock. The street was full of hurrying people, going home to dinner. Clattering over the pavement came an empty express wagon; the driver hesitated, then turned up to the brimming water basin, and let the big gray horse plunge his nose in the cool water. A flock of brown sparrows were taking shower-baths in the overflow; and as the driver waited his eyes followed them with amusement from the water to the branches where they dried their feathers. What was that under the tree? A child lying asleep on the grass?

"Looks like my little woman," said the driver, jumping over the fence, and coming up to the tree in three strides.

"Sure's you live it's herself," said he, as he picked the little sleeper up in his strong arms. He stooped again for the doll, and thrust it head first into his pocket; but the little hand clung to the flowers even in sleep. The big horse whisked them away, but with the jolting of the wagon the blue eyes opened.

"What ye s'pose mother'll say?" asked the driver, pressing the soft cheek against his rough coat. "Where was ye goin', anyhow?"

"Just went a-walking," said the little woman, "and I couldn't go back cause the house got lost."

When the terrified mother had assured herself that her darling was safe and sound, when the little woman was eagerly crowding her withered flowers into her tin cup, the father looked up from his dinner to say:

"Curious how I happened to drive by the park today: haven't been that way in a week."

"'Tis His hand that leadeth me," sang the little woman over the flowers.

The father looked at the mother and nodded.

"Might be," he said thoughtfully.—Emily Huntington Miller.

ANOTHER CHALK TALKER WRITES.

Dear Captain Deborah:—I want to tell you how a Band of Hope in Wisconsin celebrated their fourth of July last summer.

You see they lived in a town where there wasn't any W. C. T. U., nor any other temperance society and only a very few temperance people. One of these few, was a young lady teacher who had started this Band of Hope and was its superintendent. When school closed in June she was obliged to go away, so she told the Band they might take a vacation until she came back in the fall.

After their teacher was gone, the children heard a great celebration talked of in their town, and they knew that a great deal of beer and whisky would be sold and drank on that day. Surely the Band of Hope ought to do something about it.

They couldn't ask their papas and mamas what to do because some of their papas were saloon keepers and would sell the beer and whisky themselves, while many of their mamas couldn't speak or write a word of English.

So they didn't ask anybody at all, they just got together and voted to have a table of temperance drinks at the grand celebration. The boys built the table, and the girls made some letters of oak leaves woven together and tacked on boards, and when the day came, there was a pretty little booth in a conspicuous place on the picnic grounds, decorated with flags and the words "Band of Hope lemonade," "Cool temperance drinks," put up on all sides of it.

A little girl of fourteen, dressed like a goddess of liberty, stood on a box at one corner, and shouted to the passers by, "Band of Hope lemonade, only five cents a glass!" "It won't make your head dizzy, or your heart sad. Walk up, gentlemen, and take a cool temperance drink!" "Don't take that beer, gentleman, it's eight per cent alcohol and ninety-two per cent dirty water, step this way, and take some Band of Hope lemonade!"

When one girl got tired being goddess of liberty another took her place, and all day long a child's voice could be heard through the din of popping crackers and babbling tongues, shouting out the temperance drinks.

It is whispered that there was many a half-way temperance man, who, on hearing the children's voices, turned from his beer with a half laugh and called for "Band of Hope lemonade" instead, while several men acknowledged that they would not have gone home sober that night but for the constant reminder to their duty made by the sight of the earnest temperance children. When the day closed the children found that they had cleared nine dollars on their days work, which money was carfully kept by their faithful treasurer and given to their superintendent to buy supplies for their Band.

Their teacher tells me that some of the boys who belong to this Band will not break their pledges unless their hands are held, their mouths pried open, and the liquor poured down their throats, and this had been repeatedly done to some of them; while some of the girls, saloon keepers' children, would not wear nice dresses, hats, jewelry or anything they could possibly get along without if bought with money "papa took in at the saloon."

And yet, a church in that town did not want this brave little band to meet in their rooms, for fear "they'd track in mud and soil the carpet."

With many good wishes for the prevention army,

WOMAN AROUSED.

BY R. W. BRAINERD.

"What! woman at the primary?"
And wherefore not, I pray!
Need the primaries be viler
Than the homes where women stay?
Need the casting of the ballot
For the people's weal or woe,
Be so basely done, the women
Of its coarseness must not know?

"What! woman with the ballot!"
And wherefore not as well
As to trust it with the thousands
Leagued confederates of hell,
Who would doom the souls and bodies
Of the loving, true and brave,
To the black and cruel darkness
Of the drunkard's awful grave!

"What! wives electioneering!"
And wherefore not, when men
Come from wild and drunken orgies,
In a gambler's lowest den,
Reeking with disgrace so shameful
Wives and sisters must not see,
Lest they curse them in the anguish
Of their outraged loyalty.

Since the women have to suffer
All the horrors of the drink,
Since the children of the drunkard
Early learn with dread to shrink
From the footstep of their father,
Let the mothers bravely go—
With the ballot or without it—
To the polls to fight the foe.

Let them shoulder stand to shoulder,
With their faces in the light
Of a Love that is eternal,
Working for their homes and right.
Knowing He who holds the nations
In the hollow of His hand,
Surely leads them in the conquest,
If but in His light they stand.

Let them use the nation's franchise,
When the nation learns to trust
Those who work for love and duty
Oftener than gold or lust.
Let them save their sons and brothers
From the blackness of despair,
By the soul's utmost endeavor
Faithful work and earnest prayer.

PATHOS, POVERTY, PRIDE.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "WITHIN IRON BARS" "EDGAR WARNER," ETC.

"There was your great mistake, and I was afraid of it at the time. You were not aware of how often you said 'Oh don't' to him when he was handling things, and that night he plucked the rose from off your bush and drew it through his button hole, you said, 'Oh Bryant how could you? It will not have another one on it for a month,' and when he tipped himself back in his chair, and placed his feet on the stool you had made for him, 'oh don't, you will soil the embroidery with your boots.'"

"A man wants a home for relaxation and rest, Mary, and if you make it a prison to him by your continual cautions, he will seek freedom elsewhere. Now Mary, Bryant has no inherited taste for liquor. I should judge by all you have confessed to me this morning, he has acquired it gradually. Come, let us work together during my stay with you, and with God's help we will save him yet. And Mary—forgive me dear—this habit of slovenliness has graduully grown on you, the outgrowth of despair perhaps. Take hope again dear, and let us make the home second our efforts.

"Get me a cup of tea and a little toast for I have had no breakfast yet, and then we will plan our battle againt this terrible foe."

Mary flushed and paled, and then with a moan confessed there was not a crust in the house, and that was why Bryant had not come home, for she had told him she could not part with the furniture hallowed by her father's use. It was all that was left them now.

"If I go to the hotel Mary it will cost me $7 per week for board. Now my pride is as great as yours and I shall not stay a day unless you will let me give you the same, and you furnish me some of your old time meals I used to enjoy so much. Here is for one week dear, and you send a boy to get what you need while I make friends with the children." Mary tried to refuse but was too weak and faint to persist.

After they had all partaken of the meal, and she and her aunt began plotting against her husband's ruin, she found her hope reviving under her aunt's cheerful confidence, and went to work with a zest unknown for many months.

She gave up her father's room for her aunt's use, and enough furniture could be spared from it to fill up the gaps in the parlor. The front windows were thrown open, the piano raised, and the sheet of music Bryant loved laid on the rack. The fire was started in the grate and its ruddy blaze reflected in the polished surface of the piano, seemed to people the empty room with life and motion.

Poor Mary had a hard time to arrange their scant wardrobe, but her hair was done up becomingly and even so slight a thing as this and a collar at her throat, revived the old grace of carriage and she walked from room to room of the house like a traveller returned to home after a long journey.

The bare rooms were kept carefully closed so all that greeted the eye looked cosy and homelike, although many, many of the handsome pieces of furniture that in days past had added to its charm were gone.

Aunt Blake had gone to her room to rest, so she told Mary, but the real reason was to permit Mary to meet her husband alone and prepare him for her arrival, knowing intuitively, Mary would wish it so, while Mary herself, now that everything was done even to the setting of her table in the old linen she had not yet been able to part with and the old silver handed down from other generations, found herself growing nervous as she watched the street from behind the window curtains, for the one she wanted yet dreaded to see.

CHAPTER II.

The Halstead cottage opened directly on the street. An iron door swung across the narrow passage that led to the rear of the house and for three years this had been the only way of exit and ingress.

The habitual passers by looked up with glances of inquiry at the open house and many comments were made.

"Ah the Halstead house has got a tenant at last. Glad of it. Empty houses always give me the horrors."

Mary winced as the evening breeze wafted in the words through the partially open window.

"Perhaps my silly pride has added to Bryant's melancholy. What a foolish woman I have been. Not only foolish but sinful. Please God I shall try another way."

But as a half shabby, half genteel looking man came slowly along looking in perplexity at the house and at the others near, she grew faint for a moment but seeing he had not been drinking, probably for want of funds, she hurries to the door.

"This way Bryant."

"Why Mary! What's up! How sweet you look! d-a-r-l-i-n-g;" he almost broke down over the long unused word, and he kissed her brow unsteadily.

"Who is here?"

Another pang right in the midst of the happiness of being caressed once more, in the thought that this was all so unusual that he like a child, seeing its mother making an unusual toilet asks, "Who is coming?" "Where are you going?"

"Aunt Blake is here. She is resting now but will soon be down. Come in here by the fire." She draws him into the unused parlor, seating him in her father's easy chair. But his face grows dark as he looks around the room and he buries his face in his hands with a groan which she feigns not to hear as she tells him how surprised she has been at the unexpected visit. He twists uneasily until some account of an old acquaintance catches his attention and he raises his eyes to her sweet pale face, and she meets them with a smile in her own.

When she goes out to draw the tea he follows to make himself more presentable, but the toilet making in the kitchen is ended, and she sends him to their room. As he passes through the dining room his bewildered gaze falls on the dainty table with its ample supply of food, but he asks no questions, and there are none to see his clenched hands and labored breathing.

It is some time before he emerges from the bedroom, but his toilet is as carefully made as his wife's. It only shows more plainly to the pained eyes of the aunt the scantiness of their clothing.

How like and yet unlike old times it was. Mrs. Blake's way of saying Mr. Halstead—some already were beginning to call him old Halstead—and of drawing him out in discussion was stimulant enough with the aid of a strong cup of coffee, to keep down through the evening the terrible thirst which otherwise would have consumed him. And the next morning Mrs. Blake was up horribly early to consult with him about the business that brought her to town.

She persuaded him to go with her over the city to show her the best places for purchasing and also to show the sights.

She was certainly getting to be an old toper in the use of coffee, for she was obliged to enter a restaurant several times a day for it, she claimed to be worn out with so much walking, and he had to drink with her every time.

Perhaps it was the great amount she drank that quickened her tongue, for the evenings were full of merry discussions and music too. Mary was growing young again, and the babies round faced and playful.

But the time grew near for Mrs. Blake's return home, and she had had as yet no conversation with Mr. Halstead on the question of such vital interest to them all. She felt he understood their motive, and was trying to get again the master of self. But as she watched his struggles, she realized something more was needed, and set her wits to work to try and accomplish it.

They were seated in the park one day on a bench apart from others, discussing the business which now she proposed to put entirely in his hands on one condition.

He was to have $10,000 if successful in the case, and $3,000 for his effort should he fail. His eye brightened, and he felt he was a man once more, but her penetrating eyes saw he was on the brink of the precipice and unless he at once acquiesced to her plan she could not hope for him.

"You must promise to go to some retreat and remain there quite until you have gained complete mastery over yourself once more."

The Sunday School Lesson.

April 20.] Third Quarter, No. III. [1884.

TOPIC: PAUL'S PREACHING.

LESSON TEXT.—I. Cor. 1: 17-31.

GOLDEN TEXT.—We preach Christ crucified, unto the Jews a stumbling block, and unto the Greeks foolishness. I. Cor. 1: 23.

TIME.—A. D. 57.

PLACE.—Paul writes from Ephesus to the church in Corinth.

1. The "wisdom of words" is very deceitful. It appeals to many a preacher, many a worker as an indispensable element of success. The lack of it so discourages many a humble soul sincerely desiring to do good, as to silence his lips and cut off his ministrations. If the devil has no other way of stifling and hushing voices raised in honor of the Master, he speedily avails himself of this plea: "Your words are not according to wisdom—your zeal not according to knowledge," and this home thrust is often and often successful in its purpose. Paul had a philosophy, nay, a faith that reached under and over all these subterfuges and gloried in the foolishness of that preaching which simply upheld Christ and His cross. A great painter was completing a picture of Christ in the temple. He called in a brother artist for criticism. The friend admired in enthusiastic terms saying, "O brother, that chancel—how perfect."

The artist dashed a brush full of paint upon the picture ruining all, saying:

"If there be anything there more beautiful than the Master's face, I have failed, utterly failed."

2. The temperance reform has to meet both Jews and Greeks. The Jews of the great movement of today are the good people, often the "unco guid," those who find no merit in any of the methods adopted by the reformers—the "practical" people who have fixed up a plan on which they are willing that temperance shall triumph, but can abide no other. The Greeks are the polite people of society whom all this babble of total abstinence nauseates, who believe that men should control themselves, and if unable so to do, take themselves out of the world as soon as possible. Prohibition is to such "foolishness" and to the modern Jew a stumbling block. How are we to meet these classes? Just as Paul met the gainsayers of his time. Hold up Christ. Hold up Sinai. Hold up eternal righteousness.

3. It is blessed to know deep down in consciousness that the wisdom of God is the power of God. There is no need to question if we can afford to keep close to the wisdom of God. We cannot afford anything else. When we begin to put our trust in princes and the wisdom of this world, all God's power is taken from us. We have no right to ask its exertion in our behalf when we will have none of the wisdom which lies back of it.

Men say in regard to the temperance work, Prohibition may be God's ultimate plan, but take what you can get now. Put your trust in the Prince of High License for a little time, and all other good shall soon be added unto you.

If the wisdom of God includes prohibition, the power of God is pledged to it. All other schemes are vain.

CHRISTIAN TEMPERANCE AND THE PRESIDENTIAL NOMINATIONS.

The New York Retailer, an influential organ of the liquor traffic, in a recent editorial on "The Strength of the Enemy," says: "We call your attention to the fact that not less than one million votes are arrayed against you in the various so-called temperance societies, and almost the entire force of pulpit orators of the country. Add to this one hundred and fifty-three newspapers and periodicals 'especially devoted to the cause,' to say nothing of the lay dailies and weeklies which truckle more or less to the morbid and bigoted public sentiment that tolerates sumptuary legislation."

We are thus reminded by the enemy that in votes and influence the temperance people of the country hold the balance of power and are able to dictate at least what sort of men shall NOT be nominated for the presidency. The Woman's Christian Temperance Union has shown in Kansas, Iowa, Ohio and elsewhere that even without votes they are a strong political power, and we fully believe that no republican candidate for the presidency can be elected against whom the women of the country will declare themselves. It is also a significant fact in this connection that the independent voters, who are slaves to neither party, are now far more numerous than ever before.

The recent canvass shows that the members and adherents of evangelical churches in this country include thirty-five of the fifty millions of our population. Christian and temperance people, through their newspapers, ought to make their influence felt before the nominations, as opposition afterward can be effective only in the way of defeat. In politics prevention is better than punishment. Let all religious and temperance papers proclaim with certain sound before the nominating conventions assemble, that no man who has made the White House an abettor to the intemperate habits of the country, dragging it down from its former high position of total abstinence, can ever be returned to that place by the American people. Let the million of temperance voters make it understood in advance that the nomination of such a man means the defeat of the party nominating him. Let them also give due notice that no senatorial lobbyist of rumsellers, no man, whatever he has done in suppressing slavery, who is a friend of the slave drivers of the liquor traffic, can by any possibility be elected president of this Republic.

Religious and temperance newspapers ought to make it so clear that he may read who runs, that no man who is a mere politician, afraid of the threatening rum rings; no man who dodges the Mormon question; no man who has voted for the un-American, un-Christian Chinese bill; no man who feared to deal with the great moral questions that have come before congress and the country can be elected, by the republican party at least, to the presidency. The man who heads the ticket must be, in order to election, one who at any rate has not dodged the temperance issue, and either president or vice-president ought to represent that great and growing element of both parties, the prohibitionists. Senator Blair or ex-Gov. St. John or some such man must be either first or second on any ticket that claims to be abreast of the times. After what has taken place in Missouri and a number of the southern states, it is a question if in the democratic party any senator who has championed the liquor interest can command the full vote of his party.

Although the great W. C. T. U. constituency cannot vote, yet it can revolutionize nominating conventions as well as determine elections if so minded.

A SOBER WORD ON HUMOR

Of all platforms none other makes so wide and useful use of humor as does the temperance platform. Without his wealth of humor Gough had been a pauper in good results. It is a blossom on the subject as natural as the blossom on the nose that long has kept itself under a tumbler. There will ever be a comic side to the misery of toperdom; it is the only compensation for its tears. Mother weeps over the beloved just foolishly boozy—intellect at half-mast, the world laughs over him, and it can't help laughing, for the victim is ridiculous before he is wretched. And that delicate, amusing, yet loving humor which often so aptly "points a moral and adorns a tale," we would not repress one sparkle of. It many times holds truth in a warm spot till it sprouts into wise activity, or so links the traffic to infamy that some good young life turns and faces the other way. But when, at times, we have seen a platform bungler try his hand at a dainty bit of humor, the blacksmith has seemed pumping his bellows in a watch-factory. And worse, when we have seen, sometimes, the temperance platform feed the multitude on coarse, unbolted humor, even vulgar jests, we have felt our cause crippled where it should have been strengthened. The natural vineyard may need the unclean compost, the moral vineyard is blighted by it. And since we know we are right in this, we were grieved of late to see that a distinguished Chicago pulpit had turned "wit and humor" platform for a night to commend "Peck's Bad Boy" for light reading, a book that has multiplied bad boys like the vermin of Egypt. Other men's boys have thus become bad Peck's bad grandsons. The sharply defined characters of every widely read book widely repeat themselves. Thy humor must be cunning to hold fast, pure to do good.

"Miss Willard has left the platform." So say some of the religious weeklies, evidently mislead by her statement in The Union Signal intended to say merely this, that she will take no more "continental trips," will make her headquarters at home and not "in the saddle" and while not withdrawing from public life will endeavor to work more than heretofore by pen and ink orders and enthusiasm. The following two weeks bit of itinerary does not look as much like "leaving us in the lurch" as some good friends have pictured: Miss Willard left Chicago March 22. Held two meetings in Kendallville, Ind. where Miss Gordon organized a juvenile temperance union. March 25 spoke by invitation of the W. C. T. U. in Erie, Pa. and attended the mid year conference of the "Woman's Congress," (of which she is a director for Illinois) on the 26th at Buffalo. The next morning, she with other members of the congress, addressed "The Ladies Union" of Buffalo. On the 27th she visited her native town, Churchville, N. Y. reaching Newark, New Jersey in time to meet her engagement with the state W. C. T. U. to address the New Jersey conference of the M. E. church on the 20th. On Sunday Miss Willard gave the address at the dedication of the new Temperance Hall of Newark and Miss Gordon spoke to the Sabbath school of the Reformed Episcopal church, (Mrs. Hammer's.) March 31 and April 1 were spent at headquarters with Mrs. Buell, and on the evening of the 1st Miss Willard spoke for the W. C. T. U. of Yonkers, N. Y., thus fulfilling her agreement to give an address for the union which should send the largest "Thankoffering" on "memorial day."

April 4th Miss Willard addressed Miss Bessie Gordon's Band of Hope at Auburndale, Mass., and so far as yet planned has the following engagements:

April 7, Spencer, Mass.; April 8, Milford, Mass.; April 9, Clinton, Mass.; April 10, North Adams, Mass.; April 11, Bennington, Vt.; April 12, 13, Fitchburg, Mass.; April 14, Marlboro, Mass.; April 15, Attleboro, Mass.; April 16, Taunton, Mass.; April 17, New Bedford, Mass., April 18, Woonsocket, R. I.; April 19, 20, Pawtucket, R. I.; April 21, 23, Conn. One week in May will be given to Indiana and one to Wisconsin. June 13, Triennial International S. S. convention, Louisville, Ky.; July 15, International Teachers' association, Madison, Wis.; Aug. 7, Monona Lake Assembly, Lakeside, Wis.; Aug. 15, Chautauqua, N. Y. Many other engagements for state conventions, etc., are pending.

During the debate on the prohibitory bill in the Iowa legislature, one Senator Bills, of Davenport, widely known as an advocate of the licensed liquor traffic, made the ridiculous assertion that the W. C. T. U. superintendent of legislative work, Mrs. Judith Ellen Foster, had received the sum of one thousand dollars for services rendered for not putting a temperance candidate in the field. Mrs. Foster was absent from the state at the time, but on her return two weeks ago she sought an interview with Senator Bills with what results the following letter sent by her to Senator Donnan, the chairman of the republican state committee, and read by him in the senate, will show:

My Dear Sir:—My attention has been called to certain statements made on the floor of the senate by the Hon. J. C. Bills, senator of Scott county, in which the superintendent of legislation was charged with having received one thousand dollars from the republican party for services rendered, and for which she gave her receipt. Having been for years chosen by the Woman's Christian Temperance Union of the state as superintendent of their department of Legislative Work, this is presumed to refer to me.

Arriving in the city today I sought an interview with the senator, desiring an explanation from him in order that I might make a general and specific denial. He granted the interview, but refused to make an explanation, or even a statement in the presence of my husband. As he chose to shield himself under his senatorial privilege and thus refused to give me the opportunity of enabling him to retract his statement, I desire you to deny the charge for me in the senate chamber where it was made. The charge is absolutely and unqualifiedly false; false in letter and false in spirit; false in general and false in particular. If, in working for God and home and native land, I have served the republican party, it is a source of great satisfaction to me; and in common with the women of Iowa, I pray that the blessing of those ready to perish may rest upon the men of all parties who stand for the home against the saloon. Yours respectfully,

J. Ellen Foster,

Of this whole matter the DesMoines Register says:

The denial offered in the senate yesterday of the absurd story that Mrs. J. Ellen Foster once received $1,000 from the republican party of Iowa not to run a temperance or third party ticket was not necessary. There never has been the least foundation for the assertion. No such sum of money was ever paid Mrs. Foster by the republican party, or any republican committee, or any one acting for either. Mrs. Foster's conviction then was that the best interests of temperance were with the republican party, and that the republican party would keep its pledge as made in the constitutional amendment plank. Time has proved her sagacity and the wisdom of her courage. She may well be satisfied with the vindication which time and later events have brought her.

Thus has the matter been sent back "to its own place"—the "refuge of lies."

It does ones heart good to see Mrs. Leavitt's sign manual affixed to a document saying:

After several weeks of forced idleness, I start again today for a new field of labor, Oregon and Washington territory: to remain until July.

But sorrowful news comes from another quarter. It is that Mrs. Clara Hoffman the splendidly vigorous president of Missouri W. C. T. U., has succumbed to overwork, and is seriously ill at her home in Kansas City. The doctor orders no public speaking for one month at least.

Speaking of Mrs. Hoffman's overwork, I am reminded of its fine results to everybody but herself. Never was Missouri so roused as during this year. It bids fair to rival Illinois—the banner state—in its circulation of The Union Signal—so the publisher tells me. And Col. Woodford just from the battle ground says: "Mrs. Hoffman's work is simply superb. You cannot say too much of it. She puts tobacco into the drink pledge and gets scores of signers from among life long tobacco devotees.

Mrs. Esther T. Housh is making a great success of the national W. C. T. U. bulletin as well as Woman at Work. I trace her paragraphs in many unwonted places.

My good friend of other days, Rev. L. A. Eddy, of Cazenovia, N. Y., is preparing a book of remeniscences to appear from a New York house in May. I am sure his remeniscences will include a good deal of temperance history of which he can say "magna pars fui."

The W. C. T. U. of New York city is moving into new quarters at National headquarters. Two lectures have been given by Rev. J. Benson Hamilton for its benefit—one on "How the rum bottle fills the tear bottle"—and the other a free lecture to the teachers of the metropolitan schools by the same, on the "Water of death"—illustrating some of the teachings required under the new state law.

The Brooklyn Y. W. C. T. U. "on the hill" is a bright society. Its little leaflet is a model of its kind—setting forth its various items of work, such as temperance instruction in the Newsboy's Home and industrial school—sustaining a few reading rooms and a juvenile temperance union—distribution of temperance literature in depots, bars, stores and factories—social temperance evenings etc. It gives the following concise and scriptural "body of temperance doctrine:"

The Necessity.—"The harvest truly is great, but the laborers are few; pray ye, therefore, the Lord of the harvest, that he would send forth laborers into the harvest."

The Call.—"And I heard the voice of the Lord saying, Whom shall I send? and who will go for us?"

The Response.—"Here am I; send me."

Encouragement.—"As thy days so shall thy strength be."

Source of Power.—"Not by might, not by power, but by my spirit."

Reward.—"Well done good and faithful servant, enter thou into the joys of thy Lord."

"Inasmuch as ye have done it unto one of the least of these, my brethren, ye have done it unto me."

Such a society deserves its eminence.

California ought to be down on its knees in gratitude to us of the mid continent. Ftrst we gave them Miss Willard and Miss Gordon—then perforce, Mrs. H. N. Harris and her gifted Lydia, the phenomenal pianist—later on a sad errand Mrs. Skelton—then dear Mrs. Hobart from Minnesota, and now this very day, Mrs. Foster and her good husband, are luxuriating at Los Angeles, and I doubt not making its paradise still more attractive. The farther east lent Mrs. Leavitt, whose grand work is so lovingly appreciated, and taking it altogether I think we have laid the Pacific coast under great obligations. Suppose as a token of the reciprocity which I know is felt—the good people over there lend us Mrs. Sarah B. Cooper for awhile.

Miss Cassie Smith has been conducting revival services in the M. E. church of Oxford, Mass., for the last few weeks. Her work as an evangelist always uplifts and strengthens.

Mrs. LaFetra is determined to divorce "wining and dining"—so she gets up charming dinners sans vin at Temple hotel in Washington "all for the cause." The very latest was two weeks ago, when each guest represented some prominent line of church, missionary or temperance work. These were some of the toasts: "The church of Christ, the basis of all worthy enterprise;" response by Rev. J. S. Deale, D.D. "Our missionaries in the field and at home;" response by Mrs. S. M. Hartsock. "The brave women who dare to speak their convictions;" response by Miss Susan B. Anthony, "Education and its noble champion in the United States senate—Hon. Henry W. Blair;" response by Rev. Dr. Huntley, chaplain of the senate.

"O what must it be to be there."

On Duty.

News From the Field.

MISSOURI.

Kirksville.—I know it is late to say, that we had a good live mass meeting Dec. 23, but it has not been convenient to say so before. All the congregations in town united with us. We did not take up a collection, but made both the national and state thank offering from our treasury. On Jan. 8, we held a prayer meeting in our room, which though not largely attended was a great blessing to all who did attend.

We have recently decided to have Sunday afternoon meetings once a month in one of the churches. We have only had one, but feel sure that they will do much good. I wrote John G. Whittier thanking him for his expressions of confidence in the ultimate success of our work, and received in reply a kind, friendly letter in which he says "I heartily wish thee success in thy work of the union. The sowing is difficult, but the better time of harvest will surely come." Yes it will come, but we must all work for it, that it may come quickly.

At the Sunday meeting of which I have spoken, Whittier's letter was read, and Dr. Rankin's anthem, "For God and Home and Native Land" was sung; the remainder of the hour was occupied by other appropriate exercises, and we found our membership list increased by six active and seven honorary members. We have no saloons in our town, but realize that we may have ere long—after the recent decision of the supreme court of the state—unless we succeed in electing a city council next month, composed of staunch temperance men. To help us do this, we tried about six weeks ago to secure Miss Willard or Mrs. Foster to lecture for us. Failing in this, we decided to have a series of lectures, and have engaged Geo. Woodford for one week beginning March 24. We expect his work with us to aid in securing the result we so desire by opening the eyes of many, to help our union and make us all more anxious to work for God and home and native land.

Mrs. Julia M. Bosworth, Cor. Sec.

Princeton.—The following is taken from the W. C. T. U. column of The People's Press, published in Princeton:

The two lectures delivered by Mrs. Laura G. Fixen under the auspices of the W. C. T. U., were well attended in spite of bad weather and muddy streets, and we think we may safely say that to the temperance element of our town they gave entire satisfaction; for the other element we cannot speak, but if any were present (as we hope they were) we surmise their feelings may have been somewhat disturbed, especially if they belonged to that class which she so truthfully and earnestly protrayed as knowing no God, no Sabbath, no morality, their only aim being to build up themselves by pulling down others. As members of the temperance union, let us hope that her visit among us and her energy and zeal in in the cause may inspire us with fresh courage and hope, and may each one of our forty-five members resolve anew that they will be up and doing in this important work, that there may be no drones found in the ranks of our union.

Sedalia.—The temperance lecture given by Mrs. Fixen, at the First Presbyterian church Sunday afternoon, was largely attended, the house being uncomfortably filled. The ladies of the W. C. T. U. were wise in bringing her to Sedalia, and if Gen. Woodford makes as good an impression on the people as she has, Sedalia will be all torn up on the temperance question within the next fortnight.

Pleasant Hill.—Our union was organized here last June, by Mrs. M. Clardy, with thirteen members. We have now forty-seven members, have made over one hundred dollars, spent part of it for temperance literature, gave our state lecturer twenty-five dollars and supplied our Band of Hope with catechisms, badges, song books, etc. We have an earnest Band of Hope of two hundred members and the young ladies and gentlemen are taking more interest every day. We have given several entertainments with our Band of Hope in which the people seemed greatly interested.

We take several copies of The Union Signal, hope to send you a large club soon; the ladies of the union send a copy to each minister of the town, six in number. Our county has only four unions at present, but we hope to have a county convention soon and organize unions throughout the county. We are endeavoring to establish a temperance newspaper here and hope by the aid and generosity of our temperance men of the county to have our efforts crowned with success. Mrs. Laura Fixen gave us one of her splendid lectures here two weeks ago.

Mrs. I. J. Morris, Cor. Sec. pro tem.

MISSOURI NOTES.

Independence.—The union is at work in dead earnest, but they have a dead public sentiment to fight against in this beautiful Missouri town.

Joplin.—Your readers have already been informed of the grand temperance revival here, resulting from the work of Messrs. Holt and Woodford. Three young men signed the pledge a few weeks ago, and a saloon keeper, at whose bar they had spent $25 a week each, said to one of the citizens, that he had depended on these three young men to pay his $1,000 license. One young man who lately signed the pledge saved $40 of his earnings the first month, and another who has had a salary of $100 per month was without a cent the night when he came up and signed. One saloon keeper sold but $3 worth during an entire week, and said it was not enough to keep the fire going in his "office."

Sedalia.—A drunken husband struck his wife in the face till she fell senseless in the street. He was fined $25 for fighting on the street.

St. Louis.—An ex-mayor who now keeps saloon struck one of our leading temperance women as she passed his place, and a blacksmith across the street had to run to her help to prevent her being molested further.

Knob Noster.—A saloon keeper went with his petition to get it signed into the home of one of the business men here, and in his parlor, in the presence of the daughter, asked the man to sign the petition, at the same time inviting him to come in any time when he wanted to get a good glass of liquor free of cost. ## MICHIGAN.

In reading "News from the Field" I see so little from Michigan, but I know she is not asleep.

Dear sisters of Michigan let us see a report in The Union Signal from every district in the state, and we being the first district will set the example. We number seven locals.

Plymouth is enjoying the Lever Course of Lectures, and through them educating the masses.

Wayne writes: "We have done more efficient work as a union this winter than ever before. Last summer we presented a petition to the council, asking that our Sunday law be enforced. In voting the council stood a tie and the president gave the casting vote against us. We then published in the Detroit Evening News the facts and the names of those who against us. The voters become so stirred up about it, that they gave us new members, and we believe good ones too. We are now preparing our petition to bring before the new council and are to ask also for local option and we expect that after the first of May that we shall not have any regular saloon in Wayne."

From Detroit Central Union we hear: "We are alive and at work; keep up our business and devotional meetings with interest and good attendance. We have had John B. Finch, Mrs. Foster, Dr. Collins and others of the best temperance workers. We are now making an effort to have a police matron appointed who shall take charge of young girls and women who are brought into police quarters and we have good hope of success.

"Much individual work is being done for the fallen, all of which is seen and blessed of the dear Father. The cause we love has made long strides of advancement since the national convention."

Flat Rock.—Our meetings are growing in interest and membership. Mrs. L. M. Boise, our state evangelist, gave us two lectures from which we received much good and great encouragement. We sent for one hundred of Mr. Foster's Licence Leaflets Nos. 1 and 2, and hope to lay the truth before every voter before election. We are taking The Union Signal and from it are receiving so many cheering words, especially from "News from the Field."

We have a temperance column in our local paper and through it we keep its readers acquainted with the "weapons of war."

Three other unions have not been heard from, but we are sure they are at their post.

Cor. Sec. First District.

PENNSYLVANIA.

Mrs. Ellen M. Watson says that if we had a Narcissa White in every county in our state, she could tell us just when Pennsylvania would secure prohibition. Miss White has just spoken for the Y. W. C. T. U. of Philadelphia. As we listened to her earnest, heartfelt appeals and realized the force of her clear logic, we felt that Mrs. Watson was right. The opened doors of no less than four united Presbyterian churches testified that our young prophetess was not without honor among her own people. Miss White addressed nine meetings under our auspices; eight of these were in Presbyterian churches and the ninth in the Messiah Lutheran church. Three Y. W. C. T. Unions were organized under most auspicious circumstances during her stay.

We spent a few days together by the sea and I was impressed with the fact that our dear Miss White seemed to see and hear and rest for her chosen work's sake. We have need all over our country of more such consecrated young womanhood. May our sister long be spared to the cause she so nobly serves! And, when "not by might, nor by power, but by the spirit of the Lord of Hosts" shall be "brought forth the headstone" of that great work, the prohibition of the manufacture and sale of intoxicating drinks, may her voice be among those who shall shout for joy, "Crying grace, grace to it."

Philadelphia, March 22, 1884.

Edenburg.—I wish to give you some "Clarion county notes," to tell you what we are doing for the cause in this portion of the Keystone State.

The temperance cause is having quite a wave of success among us. Mrs. Mary Bynon Reese, of Steubenville, Ohio has been lecturing through our county with great success. Several new unions have been formed. She is a very fine lecturer and also a good organizer. At both of her lectures in Edenburg a band of men appeared in a body wearing badges, non-partisan, but pledged "not to vote for any but temperance men."

In this place we have just organized a W. C. T. U. with thirty-three members.

Hettie A. Keatley, Cor. Sec.

WISCONSIN.

Within two months five unions have been organized at Maiden Rock, Whitewater, Lake Mills, Stockbridge and Janesville.

Rev. D. R. Anderson, pastor of the Congregational church at Oconomowoc, presented the cause of the W. C. T. U. to his congregation and forwarded to the state union a collection of $3.30.

Black River Falls is again free from licensed saloons. The union worked nobly and helped to win a great victory.

Marinette has a "no-license" ticket in the field. The Eureka union is working for "no-license."

The Augusta union recently cleared $57.50 at an entertainment and supper. Their meetings are well attended and the union is in a very prosperous condition.

The Princeton union asks that the laws be enforced with regard to selling liquor to minors and on Sunday. The saloon keepers and their friends feel oppressed.

For several months the Dartford union has kept a wall pocket full of temperance literature in the most flourishing saloon in the place. We now get this welcome news. "Bar closed—no customers."

The Augusta union is hard at work in the struggle to free the town from saloons at the coming election.

The Trempealeau union has organized a nice Band of Hope. They are using Miss Colman's books, Catichism on Alcohol, Juvenile Manual and Alcohol and Hygiene.

After long but unavoidable delay the collection taken at the memorial services at Millsville has been sent in, $2 50. S. P. Bradish.

WEST VIRGINIA.

Parkersburg.—Mrs. McLeod's report of West Virginia's W. C. T. U. work, was slightly "mixed". I suspect your compositor was partly to blame. It was the annual meeting of the Martinsburg Union and not of the state.

Parkersburg has had a Y. W. C. T. U. for two years and your humble servant did not organize it. However they will cordially greet Miss Gordon.

Two new unions have been organized lately; one at Terra Alta, the other at Ravenswood and Mrs. Dr. Kendall goes to Volcano tonight to organize another.

Our state W. C. T. U. convention meets in this city in conjunction with the temperance state convention on June 18. It is not decided whether we precede or follow the latter. Mrs. M. L. Wells, president Indiana W. C. T. U. will be present and we are exceedingly hopeful of having Miss Willard.

Interest in the work throughout the state is increasing and we hope to report good news from time to time.

Mrs. I. H. Johnson.

[A note from Mrs. Kendall to the editor tells of a union organized at Volcano with thirty-one members, seven of whom are honorary.]

SOUTHERN GLEANINGS.

BY MRS. GEORGIA HULSE MCLEOD.

Our girls, whom the mothers will, I am sure, allow to be brought to the front by one of their lovers just this once.

I read somewhere in eastern lore a story that has left a quaint picture in memory.

A little child upon the sea shore flung out upon the waves a handful of grasses. Hours after, another wave came rolling in, and as the white crest broke upon the shore threw back the grasses, with them tangled fast a string of pearls. So it seems to me that the pure hands of our daughters are casting bright gifts on the waste of waters, humanity's sea, that by-and-by shall bring back, as pearls, souls redeemed, wrecked lives made new and pure by girlish effort. God bless them every one from Maine to Florida, from the east unto the west.

The Y. W. C. T. U. of East Baltimore have been busily engaged this week holding a fair and festival for the benefit of the temperance cafe, and their earnest efforts deserved success.

At the same time the girls of "the Ladies' Confederate Association," who do not yet (I am sorry to say) belong to our W. C. T. U., held a Russian tea party, and met with great success. I give this item thinking our girls may like to use the idea, and if so, shall be glad to give them any information as to program. The W. C. T. U. of Lutherville, Md., publish a seminary paper and hold a monthly sociable. Those of Parkersburg, West Va., are in every good work, busy all the time, and their youngest state sisters of the Grafton Y. W. C. T. U. are following in their steps. When we remember how many have been trained by Miss Taylor the gifted educator and state president, we are not surprised at such results.

In Georgia one of the brightest girls in the state is actively interested in the success and circulation of our national organ.

In South Carolina the Chapin union does honor to its name, and the Greenville maidens with tongue and pen, are worthy of loving mention.

In Texas we have a gifted young editress Miss Josephine Cullemore, whose paper.I watch for with eager interest, and last not least all honor to "our lady of the flower;" with a fairer sweeter mission than any dreamed of by Chaucer or Dryden our gentle care-taker of those in prison, Miss Casseday of Louisville, Ky.

Who can tell the extent of such influences, forces set in motion by Fannie Barnes of New York, and our Anna Gordon, whom we all claim.

Oh girlish hearts beat aye so true,
And young hands reach so far,
And girlish lives are beacon lights,
To guide to Bethlehem's star.
God bless the girls, and make them
A chain of circling love,
Linking some wanderer brought home,
To hope, and rest above.

South Carolina.—Mrs. Chapin just returned from the Louisiana convention, pausing a day or two in Georgia for a few hours work, and a fling of her pen—thoughts of an editor, finds a correspondence that might dismay even our liege lady—were not "Little Opportune" to the fore.

She goes in answer to an urgent call to six towns in her own state. and in each she says a union shall be organized. What she says she means.

North Carolina claims her next, and there is much work laid out for her to do.

Georgia.—The corresponding secretary of the Quitman W. C. T. U. writes me a delightful letter. Among its items I find that with a population of eighteen hundred, there are seven churches—a flourishing high school, with a large attendance—and alas! five saloons all doing a large business. Quitman is not alone in such a record. The sunlight however comes in here, for says my correspondent, "Our citizens are uniting their efforts to remove this evil from our midst, and at the late election on the prohibition ticket for mayor, my husband was put in office."

White ribbon army, "be of good courage, and go forward!"

NEW YORK.

Troy.—Our Woman's Christian Temperance Union hold weekly meetings, and great pains is taken by our efficient president, Mrs. L. E. Greeley, to make these meetings in every way attractive, and the continued increase in our numbers, is the best proof that she has not labored in vain. During the past month she has organized a Woman's Christian Temperance Union in Cahoes, N. Y., (one of our neighboring towns) and very shortly we hope that through her efforts a Y. W. C. T. U. will be in working order in our own city.

We are happy to be able to report that Mrs. M. H. Hunt favored us with her presence a few weeks ago. Her address, "Waiting for the Verdict," was thoroughly enjoyed by all her hearers.

After the good news reached us that the bill had passed compelling scientific temperance instruction in our public schools, we held a praise service in our accustomed place of meeting. A. H. G.

ILLINOIS.

The Mercer county convention held at New Boston, March 5, 6, was a most successful one. Mrs. Randolph of Carthage and Mrs. Kirkpatrick of Monmouth, were with us and rendered most helpful service. Mrs. Randolph read a paper on "The Duty of Christian Women with regard to the Temperance Question." A discussion of the subject resulted in the conclusion that working in this cause was surely working for the Master most faithfully. If it were not giving cups of cold water, feeding the hungry and clothing the naked and trying to comfort and to remove temptation from the weak no mortal could tell in what such work consists. The two ministers present bore earnest testimony to the fact that the women of their congregations upon whom they depend for any and every kind of work in the church are the women who have their hands and hearts full of this temperance cause and work.

In the evening the two ladies mentioned entertained and instructed the audience with arguments for our work and statements of the methods adopted by our society. For the benefit of the young people the president recited a rare poem.

Temperance instruction in the public schools was discussed, not so fully as intended, but some food for thought was given. The ballot, and the beginning place, the primary meetings, proved a good subject. It was introduced by Mrs. Kirkpatrick, but the gentlemen present participated in the discussion, and we hope some of them were led to see the mistake so many good men make by neglecting these meetings, and will change their habits in this matter.

The W. C. T. U. of the town prevailed on the school board to allow the children an hour for the meeting, and we hope the hour spent with them will prove as profitable as any other of the convention.

The next question taken up was the "Liquor Traffic vs. the Sabbath." Scarcely an argument on this point is needed, but the statements concerning the matter were new to many and we hope will lead to an investigation by many good but careless people which will result in good. The finance question was opened and it also proved an excellent topic for everybody. The admission was readily made by every one that we have attempted, or are attempting, more than we have provided ourselves means to carry out, but the suggestions were various. One would add to the fees, another would solicit more from the gentlemen, make a strong effort to bring them into the work, as honorary members, or any way to secure their hearty support. This came from gentlemen, Rev. G. M. Bassett, and the president's husband, Mr. Wycoff, who both claimed to have been thoroughly "converted" at the convention. Mr. Bassett stated that he was "convicted" a few evenings before by Miss West, of the greatness of our work. The suggestion was considered a good one. The unions represented at the convention agreed to try to obtain some one to come into the county for a month or more as organizer to whom they will pay a salary. M. J. Wycoff, Co. Pres.

DEPARTMENT OF FLOWER MISSION WORK.

Dear Sisters of the Ill. W. C. T. U.:

The breezes are coming from the southland, bringing to us in the song of the birds, the springing grass and budding flowers the greeting of the springtime. Amid the manifold blessings of this glad time there seems to come the sound of a voice bidding us work in barren and waste places, that "instead of the thorn shall come up the fir tree, and instead of the briar shall come up the myrtle tree."

"He is truest of God's prophets, who would strew the path with flowers
Of immortal truth and goodness, springing up in darkest hours."

Dear women of Illinois, we have only to make the call and point the way, and we know a thousand loyal hearts and willing hands will respond to the beautiful work of the Flower Mission.

As superintendent of this department, I offer the following suggestions:

1. The 9th of June, is the day set apart by Miss Jennie Casseday, National Superintendent of Flower Missions, as "Prison Day." I therefore ask you to observe this day, by visiting the prisons and jails of your place, and holding gospel services wherever practicable, carrying flowers with you, giving to each prisoner a bouquet tied with white ribbon to which let a Scripture text be attached.

2. Have a committee appointed at once in your union who will carry on the work of this department during the summer.

3. I recommend as far as possible, systematic visiting in prisons, jails, work houses, hospitals, orphanages, homes for the friendless, and in the neglected homes of our land, always carrying flowers and scripture texts with you, that your works may be as garlands of good deeds interwoven with the leaves of the tree of life, which are for the healing of the nations.

4. I suggest as work for unions in small towns located near Chester, Joliet, Peoria, Chicago and other cities where there is difficulty in obtaining sufficient flowers for the work, to make arrangements with the unions of these places to send them flowers on stated days.

5. This line of work I especially recommend to the young ladies of our unions.

6. Through the winter months, when flowers are not easily obtained, I would suggest fruits, jellies and other delicacies as a substitute.

7. I ask all unions that take up this work to report to me not later than September 15, the amount and character of work done.

We undertook this work for the first time, last year, and the testimony of many workers was, "We went forth with fear and trembling, bearing precious seed—but returned rejoicing, bringing our sheaves with us—even the same day."

Let us take this work up cheerfully, earnestly and perform it faithfully, that the beautiful prophesy may be fulfilled through us, "The wilderness and the solitary place shall be glad for them, and the desert shall rejoice and blossom as the rose." Mattie F. Yates,

REPORT OF DUPAGE COUNTY CONVENTION.

The third quarterly convention of the Du Page county W. C. T. U. was held in the Baptist church of Wheaton, March 19, 1884. Although the weather was unpropitious it was not sufficiently so to dampen the ardor of temperance workers and a goodly number were present at the morning session.

Since the organization of the county union (Nov. 1883) four local unions have been formed, making a total of five. Reports from these unions show that the Naperville union has outranked the mother union (Wheaton) in membership, it having forty-five members and a Band of Hope of two hundred members. The union at Prospect Park has fifteen members and much interest is manifested in its meetings. This is the latest formed and gives promise of much good. The Wheaton union reported progress in its several branches of work, gospel meetings, juvenile and jail work. There are two juvenile organizations, Band of Hope and Bright Jewels. Two unions, Downer's Grove and York Center, were not represented, owing to bad weather, but are continuing the good work so lately beginning in their midst.

The afternoon session was one of much interest. Mrs. A. J. Marks conducted the devotional exercises, which were very profitable. Mrs. J. R. Smith, in a few well chosen remarks, welcomed the friends of W. C. T. U., and Miss L. Wagner of Prospect Park, gracefully responded.

Mrs. S. B. Sill, of Aurora, who was present during the day, aided us much with her wise counsel, and ably conducted the Question Box. Mrs. Prof. Smith, of Naperville, read a paper of unusual merit, on the "Relation of the Church to Temperance Work." Miss A. J. Carothers, secretary of Sunday school work, gave an encouraging report as to number of schools using temperance lessons and number of members pledged to total abstinence.

Mrs C. W. Lumry, secretary of temperance literature, reported the purchase of German tracts for distribution among the German population of the county, a long felt need.

Miss Anna Gordon, whose sweet presence in the convention was like a benediction, spoke briefly of the "Importance of Temperance Instruction in Public Schools." A discussion followed, participated in by several ladies and gentlemen. Miss Gordon then met the young ladies of town and college in the church lecture room and so charmed them that she won from them the organization of a Y. W. C. T. U.

Mrs. S. B. Sill conducted the devotional exercises of the evening, Pres. C. A. Blanchard offering prayer.

Mr. James F. Claflin spoke briefly and clearly on the subject "Tax on Bonded Liquors."

Miss Frances E. Willard then held the large audience spell-bound, while she earnestly and eloquently depicted the woes of intemperance and plead the wealth of woman's power over the heart, the home, society and government.

A male quartette with heart and voice attuned to temperance key, discoursed stirring music throughout the evening's entertainment, and after a resolution of thanks for the courtesies of the day, the benediction was pronounced and the third quarterly convention was an event of the past. Was it? No; it was but the seed time of a harvest which future months and years shall reap. Felicia H. Hiatt, Rec. Sec.

WHEATON Y. W. C. T. U.

On the afternoon of March 19, 1884, a number of the young ladies of Wheaton assembled to hear Miss Anna Gordon speak on the subject, "The work of Christian young ladies in the temperance cause." After Miss Gordon had given a very interesting address she asked for a motion to the effect that the young ladies of Wheaton should form a Y. W. C. T U. The motion was carried unanimously and forty-seven of the young ladies enrolled themselves as members of our Y. W. C. T. U. We have had one meeting and I think all are sincere in their resolve to do what they can for the temperance cause.

Juanita Breckenridge, Cor. Sec.

Resolutions of the Du Page county W. C. T. U. on the death of C. Louis Blanchard, of Wheaton, Ill.:

Resolved, That we deeply sympathise with the parents and friends of Louis Blanchard who died recently, and that we at this time express our deep sense of loss at his death.

That the W. C. T. Unions have lost a most earnest, devoted, self-denying friend.

That one whose life and words so constantly exemplified the vital truths of Christianity, will be a great loss not only to our W. C. T. U. but to the church, community, state, and country.

LOUISIANA.

Shreveport.—While we are willing to admit that we are behind our sister states of the north and west in temperance work, yet we are not entirely idle nor indifferent to the vital interests at stake in the warfare in which we are, in common with them, engaged. On the contrary, we are fully aroused and endeavoring to stem the mighty torrent of evil with which we have to contend with all our mind, heart and strength.

A W. C. T. U. was organized here last May by Mrs. S. F. Chapin, of South Carolina, a noble Christian advocate of temperance. Since then we have been working in a somewhat desultory and fragmentary way, owing I think to our lack of knowledge of the manner in which the unions should be conducted, such things being so entirely out of the regular order down this way, making it difficult for us to "fall into line" with our sister unions of other states. Yet we have accomplished some work in the establishment of a free reading room for men and youths, which is under the direction and protection of our union and which is doing much to counteract the evil influence of the saloons in our midst. It is supplied with the latest papers and periodicals, and has a great many valuable books of solid reading, the contributions of citizens. It is now self sustaining and we think it a permanent success. The average attendance is thirty every evening from five until eleven o'clock. We expect to enlarge and extend our work in other directions as opportunity affords. Our union is composed of earnest, zealous and devoted women who are ready to "do and dare" much for the cause they have espoused. As The Union Signal is the organ of our association I feel that we should all be subscribers to it, and am trying to get up a club of twelve to send you.

Mrs. Edmonia Walden, Cor. Sec.

MISSOURI.

Mrs. Clara Hoffman is now at home, and very ill with pneumonia. She will not be able to fill any more engagements this month.

Bro. Geo. Woodford will fill lecture engagements in Missouri from April 22 to June 1. Those who have been disappointed in hearing Mrs. Hoffman, can secure his services by writing to me at once. Also Rev. A. M. Collins of Iowa has signified his willingness to help us in this hour of need, and his services can be secured by applying to T. A. Vanfleet, agent of Lever Lecture Course, Chicago. He has been holding a series of meetings in Cameron this week, and Dr. Z. E. Watkins, the energetic W. C. T. U. president at that place writes me "Bro. Collins is here and is storming the fort. The Music Hall is crowded every night. We are going to roll up the scenery, and carry in plank tonight to seat the people." We must not let the work stop, though our workers fall by the way. Pray that our beloved president may speedily be restored to health.

Rose Phillips, Cor. Sec.

Pierce City.—A series of meetings, continuing one week, have been held here by Mr. Joe Critchfield. After the first lecture the opera house was crowded every evening with an enthusiastic and appreciative audience. Some of the hardest drinking men signed the pledge during these meetings. One of our seven saloons has been closed recently and another will probably be soon. Selling on Sunday, to minors etc., the cause. This is the result of Mr. Holt's work among us. We have a Y. W. C. T. U., a temperance Sunday school, Cadets of Temperance, a Blue Ribbon Band, a C. T. U. and a Reform Club, all working harmoniously together for the suppression of the terrible curse of intemperance.

Mrs. H. C. Shoemaker,
Supt. Press Work, W. C. T. U.

KANSAS.

Garnett.—Last December Mrs. Drusilla Willson of Lawrence, our state organizer came to Garnett and organized a local union of Monroe township (Garnett.)

The membership being largely the same, most of our aggressive work has been done through the local union.

About four weeks ago the question was brought before the union by one of its members, can we not do a good work in appointing a committee to go once a week to the different drug stores and take a list of their sales of liquor on prescription by physicians for a certain day or week and have the same published in each of our papers, giving the name of the physician prescribing, that of the druggist filling the prescription, and that of the person receiving it. The suggestion was carried out. The open saloon is with us a thing of the past, but its mantle, we fear, has been taken up by some of our druggists.

We have three papers in the city, two of which were ready to publish any matter of this kind brought to them.

Many very hard epithets and threats have been applied to us if we persisted in the matter, but having put our hands to the plow we do not propose to turn back, believing as we do that if the letter and spirit of the law is complied with both by physician and druggist no harm comes of its publication, while on the other hand we know that it has revealed to the public the true source of some "big drunks" that some of our old time topers still indulge in.

We have just held our first quarterly convention. We had a very interesting meeting which was quite well attended; as yet there are only three of our townships organized in the county, and two bands of Hope. We had very interesting and encouraging reports fsom these different organizations. Our Band of Hope in this city now numbers seventy-five, they gave their first entertainment two weeks ago, which was a success, as a literary treat and financially. Receipts $34.00.

Mrs. Laura G. Fixen of Albert Lea, Minn., was with us and talked to us; answered a great many question, and in the evening addressed one of the largest assemblies that we have seen in the city.

We gave her while here five subscribers to your paper and a promise that we would soon double it. Our union has been organized but a little over three months, yet we think some good work has been done. We commenced with sixteen members, now we number thirty-nine and all are thoroughly alive to the need and importance of our work.

Mrs. N. J. Paxton, Cor. Sec.

OREGON.

In Oregon the W. C. T. U. grows apace in numbers and popular favor. At the great state temperance alliance, it was well represented by delegates. We met in the Portland W. C. T. U. headquarters. The ladies furnished lunch daily, and the profits went towards the increase of furniture of the headquarters. A number of speakers from the alliance went to the Bethel and took part in the regular weekly W. C. T. U. meeting held by noble Christian women, in the especial interest of the sailors. Their labors are not without success and promise. Chaplain R. S. Stubbs is doing a good work. He is ably seconded by his wife. As an indication of a woman's influence, some of the sailors say, "We can stand the Chaplain's exhortations but not Mrs. Stubbs' touching talks." It was alike a duty and pleasure while lecturing for the Good Templars, to always speak encouragingly of the W. C. T. U., and occasionally was able to aid in having a new one organized. Mrs. Leavitt is looked for with great hopes.

At Astoria, just before leaving Oregon, I addressed the—eight, I think,—departments of the two very efficient public schools, of which the principals and teachers are all women.

OHIO.

Youngstown.—The tenth anniversary of the organization of the Women's Christian Temperance Union was held in Reading Room Hall yesterday afternoon, and the attendance was large, despite the inclemency of the weather. Mrs. Caroline L. Garlick, vice president of the union, read a very interesting paper, reviewing the temperance work that has been accomplished in Youngstown. Mrs. Mary A. Bentley, who has been secretary of the union for ten years, read a history of the association and its work during that time. The anniversary of the crusade was March 13th, and at first thought people might say the crusade was a failure; but out of this body of determined women has grown great good. First, the Reading Room block was built, then the industrial school for girls was founded, then the City Mission was organized, and finally plans were devised for building the city hospital. This the ladies have been instrumental in doing.

The ground on which Reading Room Hall is built belongs to Mr. Richard Brown. The union has it leased, but the lease expires next year. At that time Mr. Brown will deed the lot to the union, and they will erect a brick block, about 45x100 feet, two or three stories high. The entire work of the union and all of its branches is progressing in a most satisfactory manner.

Cincinnati.—The original W. C. T. U. of Cincinnati are still doing a good work at Lytle Hall, with Mrs. L. E. Fisher as president, a noble Christian leader. During the past winter a series of meetings were held and between fifty and sixty conversions was the result. In connection, lunch was served before services every evening, hundreds were fed, the weather was severe and men out of employment, with nothing to eat, were thankful for food and to have the gospel preached to them. Much good was done in the name of Christ who commanded His children to "Feed the hungry, clothe the naked and to preach the gospel to every creature."

We have instructive services every Sunday afternoon at four o'clock, usually led by one of the sisters, and short addresses from invited speakers, after which the time is given to reformed men, many testifying of the power of God to save. There is so much to be done in the cause of temperance here and so few laborers. There is one other union here doing much good, but we need many more to assist in putting down this sin cursed rum traffic that is sending so many precious souls to perdition.

Sarah M. Hornby, Sec.

Greene County.—The quarterly meeting of the Greene county W. C. T. U. was held Thursday, March 27, 1884 in the M. E. church, Jamestown, the president, Mrs. Monroe presiding. The delegates present from other unions gave encourageing reports of work being done. The meetings were well attended, and much interest was manifested. The death of Mrs. Mattie B. Long, an honored member of the Jamestown union, was announced and remarks relating to her life and character were made by several ladies and gentlemen present, and appropriate resolutions were adopted by the meeting. In the evening the large church was filled with an enthusiastic audience, which was ably addressed by Rev. Robb, Rev. Kelly, Rev. Newhouse and Rev. Witter. We would like to tell of all the good things which were served out to us but space forbids. We separated at night feeling a new love for our work, and an increased conviction that women have a work to do.

MINNESOTA.

Sleepy Eye.—We write to you from Sleepy Eye to inform our sisterhood that the mystic letters W. C. T. U. link together the hearts of 24 members in the great band of Christian workers. Our village about sixteen hundred inhabitants. A large majority are Germans and Scandinavians. Thirteen saloons are well supported and do sad work.

We hold a public service on the third Sabbath evening of each month in one of the churches. The Congregational and M. E. are the only American churches here. The German Methodist is the only foreign church that joins with us. At these meetings our president conducts the exercises, the choir furnishes the music, the pastors take part, and members of the union and children furnish essays, readings, recitations and songs—everything is temperance. They are pleasant and profitable meetings. We have good audiences, and they enjoy them, and give us generous collections. We sow the seed with prayer and faith and leave the result with God.

Whether this report finds a place in your columns or oblivion in the waste basket will be left to your judgment and wisdom, and we will remain a faithful band, praying and hoping for success, meanwhile gaining strength and advice from the pages of The Union Signal.

Mrs. C. B. Blake, Sec. W. C. T. U.

In a little Missouri town eight W. C. T. U. women made desperate by the influence of the druggist of the place, entered his store a few weeks since, offered to buy his stock of liquor on condition that he promise not to sell any more, and on his refusal to sell four raided his cellar and emptied his bottles while four guarded the cellar door.

ANOTHER
Special Offer.

Arrangements have been made with the publishers by which we are enabled to offer Tunison's Matchless, Historical County, Railroad, Distance and Index Map of the United States, and Illustrated Map of the World, as a Premium upon exceptionally good terms.

A double map, about four by five feet in size, mounted on rollers, bound with tape, colored, varnished and finished in the highest style of the art, with reversible attachment; shows the states on the largest scale possible to give the whole United States on one sheet. The counties are about one inch square, each in separate color, and the names are bold and plain. With each map is supplied, free of cost, a copy of "TUNISON'S RAPID COUNTY FINDER, OR INDEX," giving complete index of position and population of every county in the United States, by a superior method, used and adopted in the official publications of the government.

The style of engraving has never before been equaled; the names of the counties and county seats stand out bold and plain, and the diamond lettering enables us to show thousands of stations and postoffices not shown in other maps.

The map was constructed by the most accomplished draughtsmen and engravers, is based on government surveys, official railroad information, and its accuracy is unequaled, four to twenty years newer in design, possessing every quality and merit, and justly deserves the character expressed in its title, "matchless, historical, county, railroad, distance and index map."

This map shows all the new counties correct to date, including the thirty-two (32) new counties made last year. It also shows where every tribe of Indians is located, and gives the number inhabiting each reservation. Also shows all the new western surveys, mining towns and stage stations, and every post office in the west.

The rivers are double lined as far as navigable, enabling us to tell how far boats can ascend any river.

This is also a complete railroad and distance map, giving the names of the railroads printed on them, so we can tell what railroad to take to go to any town or place, and the distance is marked between the stations with figures; thus we can find the shortest route, cost of travel, and exact distance between any two places.

On the reverse side are three complete maps of the world, also separate maps of Europe, Egypt and the Holy Land.

The globular map (in hemispheres) shows the world round, as it actually is, and on a flattened scale, as it appears to us in traveling over it, and is one of the latest and best maps of the world published, showing latest discoveries in the Arctic regions, giving the explorations of the "Hall" and the "Herald Jeannette" expeditions, showing the islands discovered and named by them, within 400 miles of the north pole.

We have in this map the ocean routes of inter-communication, with distances marked from port to port; telegraph cables in the different oceans, and the routes of African explorations from the beginning of this century to those of Livingstone and Stanley.

Below the map of the world is a "Chart of the World," on Mercator's projection, showing voyages of discovery from earliest times to the present date. Names of navigators and the date of the voyages are given alongside each route. The degrees of heat and cold are given by Isothermal lines crossing those countries having same average temperature.

The distribution of races of mankind (illustrated by typical heads, in primary and secondary varieties, as taught by Prof. Guyot), is shown by a system of parallel rulings at different angles, covering the face of inhabited countries. The prevailing religions of the various countries are also shown, defined by different colors. Points of greatest depth in the several oceans, from official soundings are shown.

The small globes show the animal and vegetable life of both continents, arranged according to the zones to which they are native, with explanatory text. Bordering the globular map of the world are the eighty-one flags of the world. In the lower left hand quarter is our diamond map of Europe, and in the lower right hand quarter is our topographical map of the Holy Land, with ancient and modern names, showing modern Egypt in detail, railroad system, Suez Canal, Delta of the River Nile, the Sinaitic peninsula, etc. A map of the ancient world shows the travels of St. Paul, as recorded in Holy Writ, besides names and locations of places mentioned in the New Testament, the route of the wanderings of the Israelites from Egypt into Canaan, is shown according to reliable modern Bible scholars.

The columns on the sides show the different coins used in all parts of the world, giving the value of each in United States money. And in the triangular spaces we have a condensed historical and statistical description of the world. The variations of time in different parts of the world is shown by an original system. Clock dials, fifteen degrees apart, show the time of day at all places on those meridians when it is noon at London and "just the way the clocks tick all around the world." At the top are original illustration showing the costumes, and architectures, also a landscape scene in the principal nations of the world.

This map contains more than 100 illustrations. Among them are views of celebrated places, cathedrals, palaces, etc., of the Old World, and engravings of the government buildings in Washington—capitol, treasury, patent office, postoffice, department of the navy, war, and state, White House, etc., and many engravings of natural scenery, and great engineering works in the United States, with measurements and descriptions. No brief description can do this great work justice. But you can see this map is far ahead of all others. The publisher claims ten improvements: First, the distance marked between stations; second, names on the railroads; third small towns given; fourth, the new counties; fifth, the new surveys; sixth, the "sea shell" tint colors; seventh, rivers double lined as far as navigable; eighth, three maps of the world; ninth, separate maps of Egypt, the Holy Land, Europe; and tenth, the more than 100 illustrations forming a pictorial history of the world, showing what kind of people inhabit each country, styles of their dress, structures they build, houses they live in; a landscape view in each; and the political subdivisions; prevailing religions; degrees of heat and cold; products and exports; animals common there; the flag of the nation; the coins from lowest to highest denomination, and value of each in our money. Then, with the views of palaces, cathedrals, places, cities, etc., we have a complete pictorial history of the world. Retail price of the Map and Index Book, $4.00.

AYER'S SARSAPARILLA has demonstrated its power of cure for all diseases of the blood.

The Harpooner's Story.

New Bedford, June 1, 1883.

DR. J. C. AYER & CO.—Twenty years ago I was a harpooner in the North Pacific, when five others of the crew and myself were laid up with Scurvy. Our bodies were bloated, gums swollen and bleeding, teeth loose, purple blotches all over us, and our breath seemed rotten. Take it by and large we were pretty badly off. All our lime-juice was accidentally destroyed, but the captain had a couple dozen bottles of AYER'S SARSAPARILLA and gave us that. We recovered on it quicker than I have ever seen men brought about by any other treatment for scurvy, and I've seen a good deal of it. Seeing no mention in your Almanac of your Sarsaparilla being good for scurvy, I thought you ought to know of this, and so send you the facts.

Respectfully yours, RALPH Y. WINGATE.

The Trooper's Experience.

Matsen, Basutoland, S. Africa, March 7, 1883.

DR. J. C. AYER & CO.—Gentlemen: I have much pleasure to testify to the great value of your Sarsaparilla. We have been stationed here for over two years, during which time we had to live in tents. Being under canvas for such a time brought out what is called in this country "veldt-sores." I had those for some time I was advised to take your Sarsaparilla, two bottles of which made my sores disappear rapidly, and I am now quite well. Yours truly, T. K. BODEN,
Trooper, Cape Mounted Riflemen.

BRAIN AND NERVE FOOD.

FROM THE NERVE-GIVING PRINCIPLES OF THE OX-BRAIN and WHEAT G
VITALIZED PHOSPHITES.—Restores the energy lost by nervousness, weakness or indigestion; relieves lassitude and neuralgia; refreshes the nerves tired by worry, excitement or excessive sensitiveness, and strengthens a failing memory. It aids wonderfully in the mental and bodily growth of infants and children. Under its use the teeth come easier, the bones grow better, the skin smoother, the brain acquires more readily and rests and sleeps more sweetly. An ill fed brain learns no lessons, and is excusable if peevish. It gives a more intellectual and happier childhood. It does away with that feeling of weakness and exhaustion which impels to the use of alcoholic beverages, and directly counteracts a cause of depravity and suffering which has baffled the efforts of religion and morality. Not a secret remedy; formula on every label. For sale by Druggists, or mail, $1.

Signal Notes.

A Cedar Rapids special makes this statement: "Magnus, proprietor of the Eagle brewery here, has discharged fourteen or more of his employes of late, and will discharge all of them and shut down business in a few months."

We are continually making excuses about the inheritance of vices. When is the time to "right about face," if not the golden now? If one has a weedy garden, mourning over the unregenerate mother earth won't mend the matter. We must out with the weeds!—Esther H. Housh.

A dispatch from Berlin of March 13 says that "Bismarck is in improved health. The current rumors that he had altered his habits, now eating and drinking with moderation, were confirmed during his recent speeches in the Reichstag. Instead of diluted brandy, his former speech beverage, he took cold tea."

Who shall criticise the lawless classes of New York city when two hundred and fifty police authorities and policemen sit down at a banquet board and use "six hundred bottles of wine in one evening?" The rough and drunkard will naturally plead that they have a right to whisky and beer if the guardians of the law are allowed more costly drinks.—Amendment Herald.

The National Medical Association in convention assembled declared that alcohol should be classed with other powerful drugs, and when prescribed medicinally it should be done with conscientious caution and a sense of great responsibility, and that it would welcome any change in public sentiment that would confine the use of intoxicating liquors to the use of science.

After a very successful temperance campaign in Boston, Mr. Francis Murphy proceeded to Lowell, where for four weeks Huntington hall, holding 3,000 was crowded nightly Much permanent good resulted. Mr. Murphy has now gone to Manistee, Mich., where similar gospel work will be done. His son Edward is to sail for this country March 29. Over 300,000 persons have signed the pledge in Ireland in the blue ribbon movement which was led by this worthy son of a worthy sire.

A large edition of this intensely interesting and instructive book has been placed at our disposal by the publishers, and we are enabled to offer it to ou subscribers at a wonderfully low price.

The author's biographer, speaking of the circumstances under which this book was written, says:

Although cut off by his protracted confinement from all opportunity of public preaching, he was, in the overruling providence of God, more extensively useful than while in the enjoyment of unfettered liberty; for having during his leisure hours exerted the extraordinary talents with which he was endowed, he produced the Pilgrim's Progress —a work which has been more extensively circulated, and done more good in the world than any other book except the Bible alone."

The great popularity of this book is shown in the fact that it has been translated into every language on the continent of Europe.

It should be in every family. Parents can give no better instruction to their children than by laying before them a copy of this excellent book.

Judge Johnston, of California, designates the tippling houses of that state as "ante-chambers of hell."

Dr. N. S. Davis, one of the oldest—if not the oldest—practicing physicians in this city, said in a public address a few days since, "that in all the the long years he had been practicing medicine he had never met with a single case in which whisky or any other alcoholic stimulus had afforded the patient any relief, but on the contrary it had the effect of injuring him, for as soon as the alcohol was taken into the system the circulation of the blood began to diminish."

In a New York paper we see it noted that in Milwaukee, a city of abundant beer, there are proportionally twice as many suicides as in any other citv of the United States. It has been often repeated: "A man drunk with whisky wants to kill somebody else; a man drunk with beer wants to kill himself." A well-known German said the other day, "My wife and I have beer every day; nevertheless, I shall vote for prohibition, on account of the women and children of this country."

A bill has been introduced into congress to prevent the importation and sale of opium: "It recites that the habit of opium-smoking among the people of the United States is spreading with frightful rapidity under the fostering care of the Chinese; that the importation of opium has increased from 89,075 pounds in 1881 to 298,152 pounds in the year ended June, 1883; that the habit of opium smoking once acquired cannot be overcome, and its victims will not live in any place where the drug cannot be procured; and that nearly fifty per cent of our Chinese population are slaves of the opium-pipe, and a cessation of the importation of the drug would cause a large exodus of that people.

The whole province of Prince Edward Island is under the operation of the Scott Act. More than half of New Brunswick and Nova Scotia is in enjoyment of the same privilege. The latest victories are the vote on the purpose for repeal in Prince county, P. E. I., which was defeated by a majority of 1,874 and the vote on the adoption of the act in Yarmouth, N. S., which was carried by a majority of 1,204, only 96 voting on the other side. The law, where in operation, has been well enforced.

Three thousand dollars collected in fines from Scott Act violators have been placed in bank up to a recent date in Charlottetown, P. E. I.

INDIGESTION AND CONSTIPATION

ARE CURED BY

AYER'S PILLS.

Dyspepsia

is one of the most dangerous of the diseases caused by these complaints. Affecting as it does the centre of life—the stomach—it quickly deranges and imperils the whole system, physical and mental. Its symptoms are manifold, and many of them so serious that they are generally regarded and treated as special maladies.

The Only Cure

For the various forms of dyspeptic diseases, is in a medicine that will remove its primary cause, by restoring the stomach, liver, kidneys, and bowels to a healthful condition. Any other treatment is as useless as an effort would be to make a watch keep time by simply gilding its case, when it had a broken main-spring.

Ayer's Pills

Are the best medicine to accomplish the necessary work of cleansing, stimulating and restoring. They are more thorough in their purgative effect than any others, yet are not violent in their action, exercise a powerful influence for good upon the other vital organs as well as the bowels, and effectually

Banish Disease.

For Biliousness, Jaundice, and other evil consequences of hepatic disorders, there is no remedy so prompt and thorough as AYER'S PILLS. They are also, by their efficacy in regulating the digestive functions, of the greatest value to women in the most critical stages of existence.

Kidney Diseases

Also spring from disorders of the digestive functions, and are not only exceedingly painful in themselves, but have symptoms, such as Dropsy and Rheumatism, which are of the gravest character. The work of the kidneys is the purifying of the blood. When, through disease, they cease to do this,

Prompt Relief

Must be accorded to avert most serious consequences. Medicines that lull their pain by dulling their sensibility, or that stimulate them to unnatural activity, do infinitely more harm than good. To restore them to health, the kidneys must be cleansed, their inflammation allayed, and their strength restored.

Ayer's Pills

Do this more effectually than any other. Their diuretic effect is not less marked and beneficial than their purgative power. Not only do they, at once, by a moving dose, free the clogged, and rouse the torpid organs, but their continuous effect, when taken in small doses, is to regulate the machinery of life, and

Restore Health and Vigor.

For all the several varieties of Piles, and for the many Cutaneous Disorders produced by Blood Impurities thrown into the circulation during attacks of constipation, no cure is so quick and easy as AYER'S PILLS, which free the bowels and aid nature.

OFFICIAL ORGAN OF THE WOMAN'S NATIONAL CHRISTIAN TEMPERANCE UNION.

"Thou hast given a banner to them that fear Thee; that it may be displayed because of the Truth; that Thy beloved may be delivered."

VOL. X.—NO. 16. CHICAGO, APRIL 17, 1884. $1 75 PER YEAR.

SAMUEL BOWLY is dead. For more than fifty years his name has stood for all that was heroic in the early days of total abstinence in Great Britain. He passed away on his eighty-second birthday, a Christian philanthropist whose memory is embalmed in the hearts of more than his own countrymen.

THE Rev. Bishop Potter of Pennsylvania recently delivered an address on the "Drinking usages of society," which for wisdom, breadth and searching truth deserves to be in the hands of every churchman and would make an excellent piece of self-commending literature in social ranks. It is published in small pamphlet form, and though no such notice appears on its pages, we presume may be had of the church temperance society, 47 Lafayette Place, New York city.

"WILL you refuse him the nomination simply because he drinks?" asked one citizen of another as both were discussing the local candidacy in a small village, on one of these eventful spring days. The man spoken of was known as a temperance man, favoring law enforcement and good order, but his own practice as a convivial, social drinker gave the temperance party much concern as to the wisdom of his nomination and election.

We did not hear the answer of the citizen thus applied to, but the founder of American democracy long ago gave it as his conviction—the result of long and various experience—that no drinking man should be entrusted with office. Are we wiser than our fathers?

THE far west has its high license advocates in the ministerial ranks, as well as this mid-continental city. The Rev. F. R. Marvin, a good man doubtless, but as delusive in his logic, as deluded in his opinions, champions high license, while believing in prohibition, "because," he says "public sentiment is not yet ripe for prohibition." It is highly probable that the city of Portland, Oregon, is not yet ripe for pure and undefiled religion—that not over one-third of its population is to be found in Christian churches on the Sabbath day. And yet this earnest minister every Lord's day holds up Christ and Him crucified just as faithfully as if all men were seeking Him. This is duty. Public sentiment does not originate nor define duty. Right action is always against some public sentiment—but like Stephenson's locomotive and the cow—so it should be with right action and wrong public sentiment—"So much the worse for the coo, my lords, much the worse for the coo."

ON November 20, 1883, Edward Payson Weston, the American pedestrian, for three years a total abstainer, started from Victoria street, London, for his 5,000 mile walk to be completed without recourse to stimulants in 100 days. On March 15, his forty-fifth birthday, he completed his task in London, having visited many of the larger towns of England, resting on Sundays, and on Christmas day, making up the latter day's time since January. His 5,000th mile was completed in a quarter of an hour and in perfect health. He has frequently delivered temperance addresses at night after filling his fifty miles per diem. Dr. B. W. Richardson, on examining him at the end of his task testified that a more healthy condition of mind and body there could not be in a person, and said he should not hesitate to recommend him to insurance companies as a first-class risk. The London Lancet corroborated this testimony. He has demonstrated the endurance of a total abstainer. "What you want as a pedestrian," says he, "is blood, and beer and spirits won't improve its quality, take my word for it."

"O what a tangled web we weave
When first we practice to deceive," may well be the song of the Hop Bitters advertisers. Hop Bitters, as is well known, contains three or four times as much alcohol as lager beer, and yet every effort is made to palm it off upon the public as a temperance medicine. The favorite method is to secure (apparently) the endorsement of some president or secretary of the W. C. T. U., like the following which has gone the rounds of the American press, (or would have done so if the W. C. T. U., had not exposed the fraud,) and now appears in a Canadian newspaper:

PITTSFORD, MASS., Sept., 18, 1878.

SIRS.—I have taken Hop Bitters and recommend them to others, as I have found them very beneficial.

MRS. J. W. TULLER.
Sec. Woman's Christian Temperance Union.

Geographical gazeteer and complete postal guide refuse to number any Pittsford, Mass., in their lists of towns and postoffices, and as to the peripatetic Mrs. Tuller, it is certainly safe to say with Sairey Gamp of the mythical Mrs. Harris—"There ain't no sich a person."

THE English reformers act upon a principle as yet untouched in our country. They say, "If you take away a poor man's entertainment of an evening by closing up a low concert saloon, give him something in its place that shall be as amusing but harmless. If you prohibit his beer, whether by law or by securing his adherence to total abstinence, give him a temperance drink in place of beer." The writer of this well remembers the great London exhibition of temperance drinks three years since, when Agricultural Hall at Islington was filled with non-alcoholic candidates for the tickling of the popular palate. It seemed then as if all the demands were fully met, but now we have the following European advertisement in the New York Tribune showing that the most noted temperance workers of England are still devoted to the idea of supplying this "felt want," and that the want is as yet not entirely satisfied:

TEMPERANCE DRINK PRIZES: Under the patronage of a Committee consisting of

|---|---|
| The Earl of Lichfield, | Rev. Prebendary Grier, |
| Norman Kerr, Esq., M. D. | T. Dixon Spain, Esq., |
| E. Stafford Howard, Esq., M. P., | Hon F. L. Wood. |
| | Viscountess Ossington. |
| Samuel Morley, Esq., M. P. | Hon. Mrs. Meynell Ingram, |

(With power to add to their number.)

The want of a good temperance drink which shall take the place of the cheap intoxicating liquors to which the public are accustomed has long been felt, none of the many drinks hitherto in use having achieved more than a temporary popularity.

Two prizes—the first of £700 and the second of £300—are now offered for the two best temperance drinks under conditions, a copy of which may be obtained upon forwarding to the secretary a stamped envelope bearing the name and address of the applicant intending to compete.

By order of the committee,
W. HODGES, Secretary.

THE large cities are waking up to the interests of good government in municipalities—Cincinnati has been roughly shaken from its slumbers, but the smarting pain emphasizes the summons and its approaching election is likely to mark a new era. Minneapolis has asserted itself by electing a good man as mayor and flings out its municipal banner with the honored name of George A. Pillsbury as the city's chief counsellor for the coming year. It will give confidence to those who dream of days when the rich will be no poorer for sharing gains with the very poor, to know that the great milling firm to which Mr. Pillsbury belongs distributed $27,000 last year to its employes on the co-operative plan. When one of the men received $900 as his share last year, he burst into tears and said:

"I have a little house and lot but owe $1,000 on it. I have worried and my wife has worried over it. I have a big family and didn't see how I could pay the mortgage. I have saved only a hundred, but now I shall be out of debt and have home of my own."

The first order of the new mayor shuts up the saloons on Sunday, back doors and all.

The victim enters—grasps the cup,
And quaffs the demon nectar up;
He drinks, to drown his care.
Oh thou, who standest on the rock,
Above the surging billow's shock
See thou, thy brother, there.

Withhold thy censure, taunt and frown,
His sins and woes have borne him down
To effortless despair.
He sinks beneath his heavy load—
He's prostrate, on a thorny road;
Say, shall we leave him there?

Shall we not lend a kindly hand,
And with our strength help him to stand,
And find some safer way
For the poor harassed, trembling feet,
Some shelter from the burning heat
And burden of the day?

Oh, by the power of word and deed,
Show him how human hearts can bleed
At sight of human woe;
Show him a love that will not shrink
To snatch from Folly's foulest brink,
The wanderer, lost, below.

So, shalt thou lift thy brother up—
So, in thy measure, taste the cup
Thy Savior drained for thee;
So life shall burgeon from the tomb,
And in Love's warm, perennial bloom
The captive shall be free.

THE INFLUENCE OF LITTLE THINGS.

BY MRS. C. H. SMITH.

'And the Lord's servant must not strive, but be gentle towards all, apt to teach, forbearing in meekness, correcting them that oppose themselves; if peradventure God may give them repentance unto the knowledge of the truth, and they may recover themselves out of the snare of the devil, having been taken captive by the Lord's servant unto the will of God.—ii Tim. 2: 24, 25, 26, (revised.)

I am in doubt if there is a little thing outside of matter. Little things extend their boundaries so rapidly their proportions are unmeasurable.

We can see the stone thrown into the water, but before we mentally note the circle that bounds its entrance, dozens of circles appear beyond it.

Thought, voice, act, are comparatively little things, but instantly the thought changes the muscles of the face, and the muscles of the face the thought of the beholder.

Strong indeed must be one who can constantly control the face muscles, and not show them over taxed, but how impotent, of itself, this power for the accomplishment of good. Without heart, efforts come to nought, and heart in spite of will, speaks through the eye, features and voice. How these speak is of the utmost importance as means to a desired end.

The disciples were present for months and a few for years with their Lord. We would have thought them by this sweet intercourse eminently prepared for their future work and yet he bids them tarry in Jerusalem until they have received power from on high.

We see by this that love for God and desire for His service is not sufficient; that we are to tarry until we have received the baptism of the Holy Spirit.

It is not sufficient that we say a little prayer in our heart before undertaking even the smallest work for Him, unless we have already received the baptism that insures success.

We have said that thought and voice and act are comparatively little things, but they indicate by tone, the presence or non-presence of the Spirit, they indicate the reality of our desire, or the desire from the sense of its being a duty to desire. Those we are with instinctively know the difference.

The fruit of the Spirit is love, joy, peace, long suffering, gentleness, goodness, faith, meekness, temperance.

Nature has sometimes been very unkind to us in physical endowment, in fact sometimes brutal. Nature had been very unkind to Paul compared with Apollos, but what a glorious result from the indwelling of the Spirit.

The face of one of our dearest workers was like a blow to me on first sight, seen at its worst on the street cars, when tired and worn, but some one spoke to her, and the eye, the smile, the tender thought she expressed in answer transformed the face into the face of an angel. The ever present Spirit set at naught nature's barrier.

Nature had originally been unkind to her in her voice, which would have been unendurable to a sensitive soul in its harshness and coarseness had not the Spirit modulated it. There was not the least twang, that the slightest impatience could not help but give to it. Had she not been thoroughly imbued with the Spirit she would have unknowingly marred the efforts of her fellow workers. Her companions who so dearly love her cannot possibly pick her out from my description, for to them her spirit has made face, voice and all beautiful.

In contrast to her, I have in mind two others to whom nature was originally kind in form and feature. They are Christians of long standing and give time and energy to all Christian work. They are often found at the bedside of the sick, and in the homes of the poor, and yet every effort made by them seemingly falls to the ground. People shrink from their approach. The good deeds they have attempted to do show their earnest intentions, but even the neediest would suffer before summoning them.

Their voices in repose are pleasing, but the least assertion of a different view of the matter under consideration, changes the voice of one into a sharp high nasal tone that at once silences the gentle objector, or rouses to anger one naturally combative, thus preventing the mind being brought to bear on both sides of the subject, and coming to a just conclusion between the two. The other voice is changed to biting sarcasm, the effect of which is the same.

One can see how in their outside work they bring reproach on the cause they both love so dearly, and how they unintentionally mar the work of others. How from the want of the Spirit's presence, whose fruit is gentleness, forbearance, the good they would do turns to evil.

I believe there is such a thing as a righteous indignation, but woe is me, I dare not personally give vent to it, for fear the personal indignation supercedes that of the Spirit, for fear the individual will rouse me more than the sin itself.

The manifestations of indignation recorded of our Savior, were occasioned by hypocrisy and the desecration of His father's house.

"And the Lord's servant must not strive, but be gentle towards all * * * forbearing, in meekness correcting them that oppose themselves, if peradventure God may give them repentance unto the knowledge of the truth."

Would not our efforts be more effective for good. Would not our unions become a greater power in the community, if we should lay still greater stress on number two of our cabalistic (?) letters, and we strive more and more to follow Christ's way of working?

There are many scattered throughout the country whose zeal in the work, because of the deadly hatred for the evil and for all who deal in it, carries them into measures at variance with the name we bear, and brings a reproach on others who pity the dealer and the slave of appetite, and who would show them Christ as a Christ of love.

The chief object of the Eddystone tower is to lift high the blazing Freshnel burner that flings its radiance over the dangerous sea.

Our chief object should be from our very name to lift high the loving Christ, to show others the dangerous sea that is death to soul as well as body, that "He may give them repentance unto the knowledge of the truth, that they may recover themselves out of the snare of the devil."

Miss Frances Willard in the New York Independent of March 13, holds up to our view a model worker. "A quiet little woman, with the brain of a party leader, the heart of a lamb, and the face of a saint * * * by her very looks and tones disarms all harshness * * * by her gentle plea for boyhood's better chances and home's truer protection.

Even a liquor dealer sent her one of the secret circulars of his clan, "just to be neighborly he said."

How long before such a servant of the Lord could take him captive to the will of God?

If we are by nature, of great zeal and push, with a spirit that wants every thing done at once; if we are not generous to the opinions of others, and not willing to give them due consideration before insisting on our own measures, we hamper our fellow workers. The fear of our insistance, prevents their clear thought as to the best method and time, divides their mind between us and the work on hand thus taking from it its force.

What a grand thought it is that it is the Lord's work, and that we cannot through our ignorance and selfishness prevent its success, and yet we may retard it.

Then it reacts on ourselves, our own characters are marred, the quality of our happiness mixed, our privilege of being co-workers abused.

I see in the verses on which I have based my rambling thoughts the words, "Apt to teach."

Webster defines apt—"to fit, to suit."

Do we always in our temperance talks fit our words, suit our words to the best instruction of our hearers? Or are we contented with saying it in any way it comes to mind?

Some one uses the expression, "the art of putting things."

It is an art, an art to be encouraged.

All art takes study, time, practice.

If we have an important message for one, a message that may mean life or death to some one, should it not be delivered with all the accessories necessary to make it most effective? We should not be content with simply delivering it; thought, heart, eye, voice, should all be brought into service to press it upon the eye, heart, thought of the listener.

A talk on temperance which should have been one of the most impressive that ever fell from a minister's lips, judging by the words he chose to express his thoughts, reached probably but one or two of a large number of hearers. His eyes were vacant; there was no glow on his features; his voice monotonous. By closing my eyes and imagining the accessories I felt in a measure the beauty and strength of his words.

I think we, as individual workers, ought to seek after this aptness to teach, this art of putting things.

There is probably not one of us but has some friend not in sympathy with the temperance movement, or at least with the ladies' movement.

I sometimes have the most absurd questions asked me by those who are unwilling to read anything on the subject, those who are general readers on all other topics before the public mind but who skip the temperance articles. Sometimes one of our own number questions the wisdom of certain movements of the leaders. If I have kept myself well posted so as to explain the matter to her thoroughly, if I have gone freely to "our supply train" for food and ammunition—as Mrs. Lumry, of Wheaton, calls our Union Signal—I am able to satisfy her, and she in turn may explain to another.

If my explanation is given carelessly, taking her partial knowledge for granted, or in a manner which seems to reprove her ignorance on the subject, she is left in doubt and perhaps wounded, and may become for a time a useless or only a half-hearted worker, because of questioning the wisdom of engaging in a work where there are so many side channels to draw one's attention from the main stream.

If I have every week noted the contents of our Union Signal; if I have studied articles from the brewers' papers (which have often inspired the new departure in our work); if I have taken pains to inform myself of the reason given by the proposer or leader of a new movement, I shall be able to show to the inquirer's satisfaction how all these seemingly side movements blend together and do but strengthen the main purpose.

I think our leaders who are personally so familiar with the various branches of the work can scarcely realize the bewilderment of many in our local unions over the different lines of work proposed and engaged in by the W. C. T. U. Of course they will say it is the duty of every member to gain information, but they don't do it. Home cares, lack of means, etc., prevent.

I feel it the duty of every local president to present every new movement to her union and in every way possible increase the knowledge of the work in every individual member.

If the inquirer is not a member of the union and our heart is thoroughly in the work and our eyes show a glad willingness to give information instead of a surprised stare at the inquirer's ignorance on the subject; if our tones are not didactic as if instructing youth, but courteous with a well bred acquiesence to the different workings of different minds, we may often gain another helper.

With this understanding of how our personal influence is unconsciously for or against the cause, would it not be well to pleasantly suggest in our various local organizations the need of constant watchfulness and careful avoidance of personal acts that tend to lay our union open to adverse criticism, and to gently urge waiting before the Lord for the endowment of power from on high?

Should not each one of us strive after every mental and physical accessory that may make the effort put forth bring forth its greatest results?

My attention was caught not long ago by a little story in The Union Signal of a lady who purposed receiving New Year calls with several other ladies of the W. C. T. U. She stopped to consider the texture of the dress she should purchase for the occasion, at first thinking something plain more appropriate, but finally resolving to bring everything pleasing that was possible to bear on the influencing of her guests, and having means to do so, she purchased a rich velvet, and then decked her rooms with the choicest plants and offered elegant refreshments. She wished to make even her dress and room speak for temperance. Can we doubt that the eye, face and voice assisted them?

Spencer, in his Faery Queen, represents want of self control, intemperance, etc., in his island witch Acrasia. She is pictured in her bower of bliss adorned with every thing in nature that could delight the senses. If we attempt to be Sir Guyons to take captive Acrasia and her victims, we must add to our boldness every endowment to please the eye of those she has so sensuously bewitched.

Our beloved district president, one bleak day this winter, summoned her under-workers to her home in counsel, and there taught us the lesson of the effect of the beautiful in receiving us as distinguished guests whom she delighted to honor, by profusely adorning her lunch table with rare and beautiful flowers, and they smiled upon us in all their wealth of color and perfume and abundance while the silent snow covered their unrescurrected sisters in the bosom of their still sleeping mother. How their beauty appealed to the heart and stimulated brain and thought!

Soon after, the flower mission came up to be reported, and we learned that we, even we of little towns and villages, could make use of their beauty to appeal to the hearts of the sick and suffering and bereaved, and create further interest in our work for suffering humanity.

Returning to our homes we learned a messenger from the King had visited one of our number, and borne back in its tender arms a dear little babe from the mother's bosom. We gathered flowers from many homes—and their hearts were blessed in the giving—and wove them into an offering, attaching on a card that went with them our Father's comforting words that they might allay the pain of our sobbing sister.

We now have our regular committee and purpose sending floral gifts with cards on which will be written appropriate scripture texts into the homes of the sick and of the bereaved, peradventure we can take some captive to the will of God.

The thought has crossed my mind several times while writing these few little things, why write upon these things now? For I see an article here and an article there, now in a paper that has kept a long silence on the temperance subject, now in the mouth of a politician who has carefully felt the public pulse, and now in the great dailies that are forced to break their silence by the demands of their patrons, and call out for prohibition. All show plainly the beginning of the end. But let us take warning by our political brothers who sometimes in the past, from over-confidence, relaxed a little their efforts at the last at the cost of success.

Let us not overlook the little things, but be careful all along the line until victory comes. It is coming. It is coming. Northern pines hoarsely whisper it to southern palmettos; Atlantic breezes waft it over the Pacific slope; Puget's Sound murmurs it to Florida's Everglades, and Maine calls loudly to the Golden state, Prohibition in every state and no saloon on the border.

A TEMPERANCE PROPHECY.

BY FRANCES E. WILLARD.

[The spirit of prophecy seems to have come upon our National president for when she addressed the recent district convention at Joliet, she began her remarks as follows. Ed.]

Let me read to you from the Joliet morning paper dated March 3, 1900. The article is entitled "A Retrospect of Fifty Years." Speaking of material things it says: "In those days the streets were dimly lighted by a yellow flame from gas. The houses were chiefly of wood, messages were sent by wires stretched along unsightly poles, disfiguring the business streets, and as a motive power they had discovered nothing better than steam."

Speaking of intellectual things it says: "The children's heads were packed with abstract statements, usurping the place that is now given to training the five senses, while the study of hygiene and the education of heart and hand were grievously neglected."

Speaking of things moral it will say: "But the benighted condition just described, is easily accounted for when the almost incredible fact is stated that, in those days the municipality legalized the opening of shops for the specific purpose of selling drinks actually known to be poisonous, and derived a large revenue from this accursed trade! Nay more, the voting population deliberately chose their city officers upon this issue and the local government was a partner in the liquor business." And the paragraph will conclude in this wise: "It hardly need be added that this was some years previous to that greatest proclamation of justice and wisest act of diplomacy by which our mothers and sisters, daughters and wives were admitted to an equal influence in that government whose special duty it is to protect the home and shield the young and unsuspecting from temptation."

Dear friends, there are children in this audience who will live to read in Joliet papers of the twentieth century, the equivalent in thought of what I have just declared in a spirit of prophecy. The penitentiary will not be packed with inmates then and Illinois will have ceased to build immense walled cities in the vain endeavor to accommodate its prisoners, maniacs, idiots and paupers, the natural sequence of its saloons.

But this will come about as the result of causes, intelligent, adequate, determined.

These causes will be heaven ordained. They will come from a wise and holy choice between the "two possible lives" of which Harriet Beecher Stowe has eloquently written in one of her books. The words impressed me so that I can quote from memory at twenty years distance, thus:

"Two possible lives flashed upon his thought, as when, through the darkness a train sweeps by with glowing lamps. The life of worldly expediency, the life of eternal rectitude; this little life of three score years and that life immortal in which the event of death is but an incident."

Heroic lives indeed must they be, the result of whose patient, persistent work will outlaw the liquor traffic from the land we love.

THE WORKSHOP.—NO. 5.

En route in Massachusetts. April 8, 1884.

Dear Sisters of the Local Union:—By sheer force of habit the work-shop is on wheels again, but for one month rather than six and then comes "Home, sweet home." Somehow the gliding train gives rhythm to thought and has a certain charm to a campaigner. If I could picture all the faith and works that I've "been knowing to" since the rattling lakeside city was left behind, how would the panorama cheer your hopes! Those women of Kendallville, Indiana, so methodical and intelligent, although but lately "grafted in" to the great and goodly Banyan tree of the W. C. T. U., that new vice president from Fort Wayne, that earnest heart Martha Swayne, what may we not hope for northern Indiana from her gentle ministry? Why the ladies who came over from Ligonier, sixteen miles distant, under the influence went home and organized for themselves, without waiting for outside aid and comfort. Somehow I always expect most of these endogenous growths, these cases of "spontaneous combustion" from within. (Witness on a grand scale our Alabama work, where Mrs. Sibert and Mrs. Charlsie, helped by a lawyer and a minister, started our work themselves and gave it such an impetus that now, with Sallie Chapin's heroic toil and Henrietta Moore's patient pioneering under Mrs. Woodliff's presidency, that state is coming grandly to the fore.) Those women of Erie, Pa., with Mrs. H. S. Jones as leader, how nobly have they borne, and labored and had patience, as our visit proved. What lovely decorations we have found in the churches on this trip, the flag, the motto, the plants and flowers, and women equal to the "humility" of sitting beside their weary lecturer on the platform itself. That was a happy thought of Mrs Caise's. It ought to become a golden motto, "The place of true humility is often on the platform." If our women knew the good they do, the moral support of their presence to the speaker, the breaking down of prejudice that results from seeing honored and beloved women "to the manner born" ready to keep "in countenance" "the stranger within the gates," we should not find them ever "backward about coming forward" when the great congregation assembles to listen to the plea of home.

Well, passing along from Erie, we attended the midyear conference of the "woman's congress" at Buffalo, where we met Mrs. Julia Ward Howe, Miss Abby May, Mrs. Wolcott, Mrs. Mary Wright Sewell, Mrs. Emma Bascom, and other leaders of the "Association for the advancement of women." It was a delightful occasion, where wit and wisdom mingled on woman's ready tongue, where the noblest philanthropies were discussed and temperance was not forgotten. At the elegant lunch given by Buffalo ladies, the flower-garnished, smilax-wreathed tables had no stain of wine, and the good talk we had from first to last was all about the uplift of humanity. Some have made the mistake of supposing this a suffrage society, but among all the topics selected for the annual meeting, this was not included. To open better and more varied avenues of employment to women, arouse their thought, and differentiate their characters, and to do this that they may be wiser and more beneficent members of society, seems the central purpose of this movement.

Indianapolis was chosen as the next place of meeting, and we have agreed that the dates of this congress of women and our National W. C. T. U. shall not again conflict. I think by arranging time and place carefully we shall make it possible for women to attend both with but little added expense, and thus broaden the outlook of these great groups of progressive thinkers and workers. (I met Mrs. Livermore in Boston, yesterday at the executive board meeting of the state W. C. T. U. and she told me of her intention to be present at both the "National" in St. Louis and the congress at Indianapolis.)

A reception was given by Mrs. Cutter and a meeting held in "Fitch Institute" was addressed by all the leaders of the congress. Among them I was proud to hear our own Dr. Julia Holmes Smith, and our Dr. Bedell of Chicago, (the latter a daughter of Solon Robinson.) Mrs. Augusta Bristol Cooper, of Vineland, N. Y. also spoke most impressively. Mrs. H. H. Otis is our W. C. T. U. president in Buffalo and with her brave band holds the fort amid great discouragements. I am hoping that my gifted friend Mrs. Harriet Reed Messenger (whose "Grandfather Hawkes" was Mary Lyon's chief coadjutor in the early days of Mt. Holyoke,) may find time to be superintendent of the press department for the Buffalo W. C. T. U. ere long. (By the way what an indefatigable worker is Mrs. Esther T. Housh, of Brattleboro, Vt., national superintendent of the press! Charmingly does that gifted pen combine suaviter in modo with fortiter in re.) Passing on to Churchville, near Rochester, N. Y., it was a delight to find in Uncle Zophar's handsome "Willard Block" the reading room of the W. C. T. U. of my own native village, and to see the bright face of The Union Signal like a greeting as from dear ones far away.

In New York we went to the cozy quarters of Mr. and Mrs. Barnes, made sacred to us by the recent passing onward of "Saint Letitia." Chastened but of good cheer is the loving daughter of her we loved, and sweet counsel was that held by us in her hallowed home. An evening with Mrs. James Talcott encouraged my heart, as I saw the heartfelt interest of this devoted Christian and social leader in our work. A day with our loyal, level-headed Caroline Buell in the parlor-like headquarters where we lunched together, "to save time," was among the most pleasant experiences of our hurried visit in New York. But time would fail me to tell of Newark with its dedication of a theater transformed into a gospel temperance hall, and of the kind greeting of the New Jersey M. E. conference, which invited efficient Mrs. Downs, state president of the W. C. T. U., to conduct its conference temperance meeting. Is not the world moving on and moving fast? Rev. Dr. Buttz, president of Drew Theological seminary insisted on giving all his time to us, but we were not to be thus deprived of hearing one of the ablest speakers among the "twentieth century men" of our beloved mother church, and so he gave a unique and philosophic statement of the undergirdings of power which make the temperance movement sure to win. The "conference love feast" next morning at nine o'clock was a feast indeed, to our souls. It seemed so blessed that we who try to give from our little stock of spiritual power, should here be able to receive from those who are veterans in the Lord's army, fathers and mothers in Israel, all made "one in Christ Jesus." Bishop Andrews' sermon on "God's Providence" was strong and restful, like a lullaby to tired children, but at the same time a bugle blast to conflict, for when at peace in God, as we all ought to be, we are most ready for great deeds. It is only the "heart at leisure from itself" that can really "soothe and sympathize."

Under Mrs. Hammer's wing, Anna Gordon spoke before the Sunday school of the Reformed Episcopal church, which can not be other than "all for temperance" with such leaders in it as Mary R. Denman and Anna Hammer. To that dedication of the Hall I can do no sort of justice. The quick pen of the New Jersey gleaner will serve it up for our paper. But it is a radiant picture scene for memory's temperance panorama; that crowded auditorium with "Mother Hill's" victorious face gazing so life-like from the picture on the wall; those loved, familiar countenances of the women who from the first have gently wrought, as they gathered on the platform; the generous choir that subscribed so liberally to pay the debt; the temperance Cadets and Band of Hope flanking the W. C. T. U. on either side, the little speech of Mrs. E. J. Knowles one of our "national" founders at Chautauqua; the self-possessed presiding of Mrs. Blanchard of the local union, the reading of the dedicatory hymn by dear Mrs. Mary Nobles, the poem of Mrs Dr. ————; and the brotherly help of the good ministers who left their conference service to come and "stand by" as collectors.

Think of $600 from that audience of people not at all rich; think of the splendid faith that, having raised fifteen hundred dollars to secure the title, conditions the whole enterprise on the ability of these women to beg seven thousand more in the month of April, and has then over fifteen thousand more to pay. As the rapid subscribing went forward and one man called out "Ten dollars for me," a white ribbon woman whispered "he's a reformed saloon keeper." As another said, "Twenty for me and as much more for my wife," another murmured "he's a reformed man who works hard for daily bread." Oh! it was good to see how winsome are the changes wrought by gospel temperance, how deep and sacred is "the tie that binds" cultured and ignorant, in "everybody's war" for a clear brain.

That Yonkers union claimed the "free speech" by reason of its large gift, and has "worked up" an admirable meeting, following the gala day of its corner stone laying for a new temperance hall.

The best kitchen garden within our borders is there, presided over by our own Mary McClees, whose work cannot be too highly praised for thoroughness and good results.

We had a quiet meeting with the young ladies before taking the morning train, chiefly addressed by Mrs. Barnes, of whom Miss McClees says "She brought me into the Y. W. C. T. U., not by argument, but just because she is herself and won my heart." Dear friends, there is "matter of infinite pith and moment" in this declaration!

"Poor, sad Humanity, with weary feet
Turns back through dust and heat,
By the path o'er which it trod,
Back to the simple thought, by the Great Master taught.
And that remaineth still:
Not he that repeateth the Name,
But that he doeth the will."

To realize this heavenly thought, let us all strive!

OUR ENGLISH LETTER.

Dear Union Signal:—Our branch for young women at railway bars and refreshment rooms is progressing. The girls have spent two more delightful evenings at the house of the Rev. W. and Mrs. Coxhead, and Mr. and Mrs. G. M. Denny. At the first the Rev. W. Barker gave an address and at the second Mr. W. T. Paton spoke most touchingly to them on "Our Burden Bearer." Charming music was given by ladies, and the beautiful drawing rooms were thrown open. Tea and coffee and all kinds of cakes were also provided.

On February 25, we had a conference for laundry proprietors. The principal point brought out was the old story that all kinds of work can be done better without alcohol. Mr. Story said he had been an abstainer for forty-six years and had in his employ a woman, an abstainer, who had been with him for nineteen years. He was trying to form a laundry proprietors' association, that they should unite themselves for the general good of their employes, of course promoting temperance principles. Mr. J. T. Helby, manager of the London and Provincial Steam Laundry, where 180 hands are employed, and where a Women's Union Branch is in active operation, said that it was his custom to give a prize to those women who had attended most regularly throughout the year and they worked six days a week. He had recently given this to seven women, all total abstainers, who had not missed one single hour from their work all through the year.

I may mention with regard to this laundry that our branch was formed there in November, 1882. After Christmas holidays the only women who returned punctually to their work were the fifty-seven "Union women", but after Easter, though the branch had not much increased in membership, only three of the whole laundry staff of one hundred women were absent.

Miss Durrant said that her laundry which had been her mother's, had always been conducted on temperance principles, and deprecated the custom of these women of clubbing together for beer in the morning and treating each other to spirits in the public house in the evening.

I hope that other similar meetings to this one will be arranged.

I have been lately to Bristol, Chopstow, Southborough, and other places to hold meetings for the purpose of establishing women's branches, and although my committee note my frequent journeys with some anxiety lest I shall break down, I must say they are the most delightful part of my work. The loving receptions and boundless hospitality I invariably receive from perfect strangers are more than I can describe, and the more care I need the more pleasure it appears to be to them to give it. Truly the "temperance women" love one another, and everywhere seem so happy in their work.

The bill for the withdrawal of grocers' licences is down for reading on April 2. Our petition is being largely signed and we have had a good many meetings in different places to create a public opinion on the subject. One very hopeful sign is that the off. licenses association is so indignant. I do not think they would trouble about us if they did not consider us rather formidable!

On Thursday next we are to have a drawing room meeting at Grosvenor House by kind permission of the Duke of Westminster. It is a lovely house and we expect the meeting to be a great success.

My time is up but I want to tell you of a very brave action done by one of our members in very high rank. The Lady Dorothy Nevill, mother of the Miss Nevill who has written so many of our monthly letters has a very fine house in one of the most fashionable parts of London, and amongst her visitors are not a few well known names. Members of the cabinet and of the nobility all find their way there and on the wall just outside the drawing room door where all must see it are placed the pint jug of beer diagram, the national expenditure on intoxicating drinks diagram and between them little leaflets about signing the pledge and putting on the blue ribbon!!

Speaking of blue ribbon I must just tell you that we have heard of the safe arrival of my dear friend Mr. Richard Theodore Booth in Australia where he has begun a most successful mission at Hobart Town. I had the privilege of knowing him well during his stay in England and a more true-hearted Christian man I never saw.

He has left many friends here and our only fear is that through his earnestness and unselfish labors he will shorten his life. Wilhelmina F. Haslam.

THE NEAR CONQUEST OF CANADA.

Dear Union Signal:—At the last annual meeting of the Dominion Alliance at Ottawa, a resolution was adopted affirming the desirability of passing a prohibitory law for Canada, and Prof. Foster, M. P., with Mr. Fisher, M. P., were asked to introduce and second such a resolution in the house of commons.

In accordance with the action of the alliance the following prohibition resolution was moved by Prof. Foster in a very able and exhaustive speech dealing with the neccessity, rightness and effectiveness of prohibition.

Resolved, That the object of good government is to promote the general welfare of the people by a careful encouragement and protection of whatever makes for the public good, and by an equally careful discouragement and suppression of whatever tends to the public disadvantage.

Resolved, That the traffic in alcoholic liquors as beverages is productive of serious injury to the moral, social and industrial welfare of the people of Canada.

Resolved, That despite all preceding legislation the evils of intemperance remain so vast in magnitude, so wide in extent and so destructive in effect as to constitute a social peril and a national menace.

Resolved, That this is house of the opinion for the reasons hereinbefore set forth, that the right and most effectual remedy for these evils is to be found in the enactment and enforcement of a law prohibiting the importation, manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors for beverage purposes.

This house is prepared so soon as public sentiment will sufficiently sustain a stringent measure, to promote such legislation so far as the same is within the competence of the parliament of Canada.

Wednesday in each week was the day set apart by the government for subjects of this nature, and as Prof. Foster spoke till six o'clock, the resolution was not reached again until the next week, when Mr. Fisher seconded the motion viewing the question in its practical aspect and making many good points, and telling arguments.

Since then the debate has been adjourned from time to time, taking its proper place on the order paper, till at the last discussion an amendment was moved by Mr. White, of Cardwell, also a strong temperance man.

Prof. Foster and Mr. Fisher agreed to this amendment and it was accepted as part of the main motion which then read as follows:

"That this house is of the opinion for the reasons herein before set forth, that the right and most effectual legislative remedy is to be found in the enactment and enforcement of a law prohibiting the importation, manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors for beverage purposes and (amendment) this house is prepared so soon as public opinion will effectually sustain stringent measures to promote such legislation so far as the same is within the competency of the parliament of Canada."

Then ensued quite a warm discussion, one speaker advocating a wine and beer clause to be left in the prohibitory act, another protesting against the tyranny of being told what to eat, drink or wear. Finally an amendment was offered to the effect that the public sentiment of the people of Canada calls for immediate legislation to that end. On the division of the house, this amendment was lost, fifty-five members including Foster and Fisher voting yea, one hundred and seventy against.

Sir Leonard Tilley gave his reasons for voting against this amendment. He referred to the passing of a prohibitory law in New Brunswick in 1855, and stated that petitions were sent to the legislature of that province at that time in the size of rolls of carpet. Three-fourths of the people of that province signed those petitions in favor of prohibition, and prohibitory law was passed by two-thirds of a majority in both upper and lower houses. This law was in force for six weeks, after that violations occurred, prosecutions began, judgments were given appeals were taken, till it was found that public sentiment would not enforce the law passed. The lieutenant governor then desired the matter referred back to the people, a new election was had and a majority of members returned to repeal this law. Sir Leonard said, "I believe in prohibition, I believe it will yet come in Canada, but I believe it would be the greatest injury to the cause, if prohibition were today enacted in parliament because I know from the experience of the past, that it could not be successfully carried out. We must carry prohibition step by step, and that can only be done by a judicious enactment and successful carrying out of the Scott Act, through a careful selection of the counties in which public sentiment is strongly in favor of such a law. In such a way our people will be educated, step by step, and the day will then be not far distant when parliament will be able to say, wisely and judiciously, that the time has arrived when the act can be successfully enforced throughout the whole Dominion. At that time I would be prepared to support a prohibitory measure, not deterred by any mere question of revenue. I would vote for it most cheerfully, and as finance minister prepare ways and means to make up any deficiency that might arise. That is but a feather in the scale compared to the beneficial effects that would follow the practical working of prohibition."

After the amendment was lost the main motion was submitted and carried by a majority of 82. Of 211 members only 162 were in the house at the voting. Sir John Macdonald was at home sick with a cold, Mr. Blake, leader of the reform party, had sprained his wrist and could not vote, others whose wrists were all right needed backbone, but it has been generally acknowledged to be a great victory for the temperance people.

The W. C. T. union sent letters from the different provinces asking their members to vote for the resolution. Memorials were also sent by many other temperance organizations asking the same favor and these had their effect.

The aim of the alliance was to keep this subject out of party politics by appointing a conservative mover and reform, seconder of the resolution.

To a certain degree, only have they succeeded. There are good men who are not great men, who look through the narrow little window of party continually and see only good on one side, only evil on the other.

If it be true that, as a distinguised military authority has said, nothing cements a nation like blood, then surely a oneness of purpose should characterize all true temperance workers irrespective of party or creed as they rise in their strength to repel this foe which has destroyed some of our brightest, bravest sons, which spares neither age nor sex, neither body nor soul in its work of destruction and death. ## THERE'S SOMETHING HOPEFUL IN DENMARK.

Dear Union Signal:—As I hope it will interest your readers to hear something from Denmark I shall try to give you a short account of our work here. The present temperance movement was started at Veile where this writer organized the first temperance society April 17, 1879. This year it is therefore only five years since the temperance work in Denmark was organized, and at present I believe we are about 15,000 or 20,000 temperance people in this country. In Norway there are about 40,000 and in Sweden about 100,000 making in the three kingdoms of Scandinavian 160,000 temperance people in all.

The power of the temperance movement is already felt to some extent throughout the whole kingdom. I believe that the temperance movement has much to do with the more stringent laws that of late have been enacted against the liquor traffic in not a few of our principal cities. At Copenhagen our capital, for instance, the police laws forbid any intoxicated person to walk on the street. It is unlawful for any publican to sell or give intoxicating drinks to persons under sixteen years or to intoxicated persons. If any person has become intoxicated in a public house then the publican must see him brought safely home or to the nearest police station. The landlord is obliged to send any one getting drunk in his house home in a cab or other suitable conveyance. No publican must allow wages to be paid to laborers or sailors in his house. The police has authority to forbid any publican to use other women to serve the guests in his public house than his own wife and daughters. If a brawl occurs in a public house it may be closed for that day.

These laws are very good as far as they go, and the best is that, as far as I can judge from the papers, the police is trying very hard to enforce these laws.

In the first seven weeks after the new law had come in power, not less than four hundred persons had been called before the police court for transgression of the law that forbids intoxicated persons to be seen on the street. Many of these persons are not so much afraid of the fine as they are ashamed to be brought before the police courts when they are sober enough to understand the situation.

Many publicans have also been brought before the courts because they neglected to bring their work home when it was ready. A publican who had transgressed the law that forbids him to let other women than his wife and daughters serve the guests, was punished with twelve days' compulsory labor. (I think this is a very excellent way of punishing lazy publicans—let them work.) Many have also been admonished or fined because they have allowed wages to be paid on their premises.

These regulations sometimes give rise to rather amusing scenes. One night a carriage was drawn on the street by seven or eight young persons while two others occupied the seats—it was some students who after they had been drinking brought their intoxicated friends home according to the new police regulations.

The publicans are very much dissatisfied with the new law, especially the one that compels them to take their intoxicated guests home in a carriage, because it gives them now and then considerable trouble. It happens that wicked persons who wish to play the fool with the landlord or who wish to have a quick and free ride home feign themselves intoxicated and the publican is of course obliged to let them have a free ride home.

In the city of Aalborg, where they also have a similar law, there was some time ago (according to one of the local papers) some young persons, seven in number, from a large farm in the neighborhood of the city who did not like to walk home so late, as it was a rainy evening, whereupon they, after mutual consultation, decided to go into a public house where they ordered and drank a little brandy, but afterward they acted as if they were intoxicated. Although the publican had earned but very little by his customers he was obliged to get a carriage to transport them to the farm as soon as possible. The people on the farm wondered of course to see such a load of people roll up before the door, but imagine the astonishment of the driver when he saw one after another of the (as he thought) intoxicated persons jump down from the wagon and in all soberness thank him for the pleasant ride. I do not know if the publican sought any redress. The wicked deceive each other.

In Veile, where the first temperance society was organized, the authorities have some time ago adopted a law that forbids the publicans to have any servant-maids under forty years of age. As only exceptionally few servant-maids above that age will take such service we may hope that the publicans in Veile will have to pursue their harmful vocation without any further aid from woman. And that is as it ought to be, for those places are moral pitfalls for young women. But what shall the publicans now do to entice the fools into their trap? I read in one of our papers that a publican in Veile had announced that there on a certain day would come an Indian from South America who should serve as waiter in his public house. If the Indian did come I suppose he drew a crowd to the house for a while, but what next?

We have also commenced to work among the children. I organized a Band of Hope, I think the first in Denmark, January 4, 1884, and about fifty-four children and adults have promised to abstain from intoxicating liquors and tobacco.

As to our future prospects we have a good hope of an ultimate victory over the whole liquor traffic in Denmark. May the Lord hasten the day when all intoxicating drinks shall be forever banished from this small but beautiful country. Pray for us. Yours truly,

Carl F. Eltzholtz,
Vice-Pres. Denmark Total Abstinence Soc.

HONOR HEAPED ON HONOR

Dear Union Signal:—Have you heard from our city election (Denver, Col.), of three days ago, and the women's part in it? Miriam's song is in my heart all this week. Denver never had so quiet an election: Denver never had so clean a council. Three liquor loving men who confidently counted on place, were replaced by three prohibitionists—honest men.

At the start, Mrs. S. Smith and I of the W. C. T. U. (women!) were put upon the committee of twenty-five citizens to make and run a prohibition ticket. The union and the women of lodges though small in number were full of faith and good works. The W. C. T. U. requested certain pastors to have churches open for prayer meeting at eight o'clock on election morning. There were four earnest prayer meetings as the polls were opened at eight. For three weeks previous, Christian women were requested through the papers to join in a concert of prayer every day when the one o'clock whistle sounded. (Don't you suppose some folks hated to hear those whistles?)

Parts of some wards and other wards entire were taken by the ladies of the W. C. T. U. to canvass for prohibition voters. Some of the territory these women went over from three to five times with the same object—arousing public sentiment. At the last not a daily paper would print anything but the barest announcements of meetings.

Then Rev. Dr. Hays wrote some grand campaign documents and our union did what it could by circulating cards to women in all the homes the day before election, begging them to ask the "Johns" of their homes to vote "for Sallie and the children."

On election morning, in the midst of such snowy slush as this climate seldom offers, every precinct of the city, except two that were cowed by the liquor element, that had a prohibition candidate, had a coffee stand near, "manned" with timid but earnest women, where good coffee and prohibition votes and temperance literature were given all who came, till the polls were closed. This was our motto and prayer to the voters: "Vote for the purity and peace of our homes." There were fifteen such stands and centres of influence.

There had been sober primaries and there was a sober election. That night a meeting at the Central Presbyterian church (where Miss Willard organized the union) kept the walls ringing, as one ward after another sent in the reports. Col. Sherman, brother of Iowa's governor, said he never saw a more enthusiastic meeting in that state during the great campaign for constitutional amendment."

"It was a famous victory", and our hearts cry, "Bless the Lord, O my soul, and all that is within me bless His holy name." O. B. D.

CHILDREN'S EASTER.

Breaks the joyful Easter dawn,
  Clearer yet, and stronger;
Winter from the world has gone;
  Death shall be no longer.
Far away good angels drive
  Night and sin and sadness;
Earth awakes in smiles, alive
  With her dear Lord's gladness.

Rousing them from dreary hours
  Under snowdrifts chilly,
In His hand He brings the flowers,
  Brings the rose and lily.
Every little buried bud
  Into life He raises;
Every wild flower of the wood
  Chants the dear Lord's praises.

Open happy buds of spring,
  For the sun has risen!
Through the sky sweet voices ring
  Calling you from prison.
Little children, dear, look up!
  Towards his brightness pressing,
Lift up every heart, a cup
  For the the dear Lord's blessing!

"INASMUCH."

BY SIDNEY DAYRE.

"Mamma, may I take some of my birthday dinner to poor little Harry?" said Jessie, looking up from her last bunch of grapes.

"Yes, dear," said her mother. "I am sure it will make Harry very glad if you remember him."

"I am going to make everything look as nice as I can." And Jessie brought a dainty little basket, and pleased herself in trying how she could make the pretty things look prettier. Two little fancy glasses of shining jelly were put in first, then a few oranges, and over all some beautiful bunches of grapes.

"Now I'm going to put some flowers on it." She ran to the garden and brought some pansies and geranium leaves, and having arranged them over the bright fruit, she went to the pantry for a napkin to cover it, that the sun might not wilt the pretty things. Mrs. Murphy, the washerwoman, was talking to the cook, and Jessie waited to hear her answer to the question:

"How is your little Katie now, Mrs. Murphy?"

"Indade, an' it's very wake the faver's left her, thank ye, ma'am. It's hurrying to get home to her I must be, wid this bit o' soup the mistress is givin' me, for they all says she must be havin' plenty o' good food and fruit—as if the likes of a poor body could buy fruit for her, whin it's all I can do to put the bit o' bread in their mouths!"

Jessie had often seen meek-eyed little Katie Murphy as she had carried big bundles of clothes back and forth. She now remembered not having seen her for some time. Had the poor little thing been wasting with fever all these bright days in which she herself had been so enjoying every hour of sunshine? And now lying weak and helpless in that dreadful little house in the alley, where the sun, which beamed so kindly upon herself through the trees on the lawn, poured down a heat that dried and scorched and withered. Jessie remembered how she was always petted and indulged in any trifling ailment, and her heart went out in loving pity for the poor child who had not even the comfort of her mother's company through the dreary hours.

She went back to the dining room with a sober face.

"Mamma, may I take this to Katie Murphy instead of to Harry?"

"Yes, Jessie, if you wish to."

"You see, mamma, Harry's sick, but he's got his mamma to stay with him and all the nice things he wants. But poor little Katie's all alone and hasn't anything."

"Ho!" said her brother George," I wouldn't take her such a thing as that. She wants useful things, not pretty things. Give the basket to Harry and carry Katie some things in a tin pail."

"No!" said Jessie, shaking her head very positively. "I don't know why Katie shouldn't like pretty things as well as anybody else. You'll send her the tin-pail things won't you, mamma dear?" she said coaxingly.

Mamma smiled and Jessie set out. Harry lived very near, and she went up to the window as she saw his lounge drawn up before it. He had broken his leg a few weeks since and sometimes found it very hard to lie still so long, as indeed, it was, for a lively little boy.

"Harry," said Jessie, "see what I've got."

"Oh, how pretty!" he said as she lifted up the napkin.

"I'm taking it to a little girl who has been sick for a great many weeks, and oh, Harry! if you could only see what a dreadful place she has to stay in—so hot and dirty, and her mother has to stay away from her most all day, and she never has any nice things to eat, nor anything pretty to look at."

Harry looked at the trees and vines which shed such a freshness about his window, at the flowers and grass below, and then at the pleasant things inside which went so far towards helping him through the long days. The little stand beside him was crowded with picture-books and games and a plate of dainties, while his mother sat near ready to read to him or play with him. He looked thoughtfully at Jessie.

"I'm glad you're going to see her, Jessie. Sometimes I think I'm awfully badly off, but look at all I've got to help me through. Here, take these too." He gave a little box of candy and a book full of gay pictures and Jessie went on, well pleased that she had set Harry to thinking he had a great deal to be thankful for even if he was shut up for awhile.

A pinched, pitiful little face it was which looked out upon her from Mrs. Murpy's window. It would be hard telling why poor Katie wanted to be near it, for nothing could be seen outside except the dusty street and a brick wall opposite. And it was very seldom that anything came by as sweet to look at as the dear little lassie who smiled up at her, lolding out the beautiful basket.

"Oh-h-h-h!" Katie drew a long breath and the next moment the little girl and basket were close beside her. How glad Jessie was that she had brought her good things to brighten this forlorn room and this poor weary face!

She forgot the dirt and close stifling air as she sat down and made Katie laugh over the funny pictures and eat some of the cool fruit.

"It's like you the angels will be lookin' I know," said Katie as Jessie at last kissed her good-bye, promising to come again.

"Oh no," laughed Jessie. "I never heard of an angel wearing a ruffled dress and braided hair and carrying about baskets and books, did you?"

But she felt sure as she walked home that the angels can have no sweeter work than the doing of little deeds of kindness for love of the Master.—Interior.

THE NATIONAL W. C. T. U. PRESIDENT TO THE PREVENTION ARMY.

Dear Captain Deborah:—It would have done your heart good to see the exhibition given by Bessie Gordon's Band of Hope in the Methodist church (Rev. J. W. Bashford's) last evening. From small beginnings and amid many discouragements this heroic young lady has persevered until she has ninety names on her pledge roll. Anna Gordon offered a prize "To the scholar who should have the best record of punctuality and deportment," and the "emulation without envy" was so general that fifty boys and girls received prizes. "The Little Captain" by Lynde Palmer, a very attractive edition published by the American Tract Society. To silence all objections about this pledge, Miss Bessie sent out the following blank to the parents:

Auburndale, ——, 1884.

We, the undersigned, do hereby certify our approval of the signing of the pledge of total abstinence from all intoxicating liquors as a beverage by our children. And we do hereby promise to assist them in keeping the same.

The following notice was circulated all through the village:

An entertainment by the Band of Hope, consisting of dialogues, recitations, and music, assisted by the high school quartette, will be given in the Methodist church, Auburndale, on Wednesday evening, April 2, at 7:30 o'clock. Admission fifteen cents.

When the audience was assembled, the Band of Hope, each member wearing the juvenile badge of Massachusetts W. C. T. U., marched in to the tune of organ, cornet and drum, and made the entire circuit of the church before taking their places on the platform. As they marched, in perfect time, they carried five beautiful banners, the finest bearing Miss Lucia Kimball's motto, "Tremble King Alcohol, we shall grow up," and intended as a present from this Band of Hope to the one organized by Miss Bessie a year ago in Trinidad, Colorado. They also sang while marching, "Temperance is the Watchward" (from "The Temperance Clarion," a charming book prepared by Mrs. G. N. Bordman, Melrose, Mass).

The whole scene was inspiring and more of an education to the people than a dozen temperance lectures. I am going to give the programme as a help to our workers, for this was a model affair throughout:

PROGRAM.

After march, and singing "My country 'tis of Thee."
1. Reading Scripture: Fannie Dillingham.
2. Chorus: We'll never touch the wine.
3. Recitation: George Hill.
4. High school quartette.
5. Dialogue: "Fighting against rum and tobacco."
6. Semi-chorus: The temperance home.
7. Recitation: "Pledge the children."
8. Semi-chorus: The spider and the fly.
9. Responsive exercise in (Mrs. J. E. Foster's) Amendment catechism.
10. Semi-chorus: Shepherd boy with coat of blue.
11. Dialogue. Blue bows.
12. Semi-chorus: Creeping up the stairway.
13. Recitation: Cold water for me, composed by Mrs. Nelly Bayley, National Chalk Talker.
14. High school quartette.
15. Recitation: Waldo Hutchinson.
16. Chorus: Teetotalers all.
17. Presentation of Brooks.
18. Address: Rev. Mr. Bashford.

My heart rejoices "beyond telling" over the new interest shown by our W. C. T. U. in the juvenile work. If it goes on for ten years at the present rate the children of today will carry out the prediction of little Frederick Williams who said last night on behalf of the whole Band:

"When we are old enough to vote
  We'll make a great commotion;
We'll sweep the land of whisky clean
  From ocean unto ocean.
Old Alcohol will have to fall
  From his exalted station;
We'll smite him right, we'll smite him left,
  And drive him from the Nation!"

Yea verily! and "the government shall be upon His shoulder." Your loyal soldier,

Frances E. Willard.

WHAT WILL YOU TAKE FOR FRIENDSHIP'S SAKE?

What will I take for friendship's sake?
A simple glass of water, friend,
That leads not to a bitter end;
But I'll not take the fatal wine,
Howe'er its ruby waves may shine:
When tempted to embrace the foe,
God give me strength to answer, No!

What will I take for friendship's sake?
The wheat and rye for bread, not drink
That leads unto destruction's brink:
I will not drink at yonder bar—
I'll dash the poisonous cup afar:
When tempted thitherward to go,
God give me strength to answer, No!

What will I take for friendship's sake?
An erring brother by the hand,
And lead him to some temperance band:
I'll take life's work for me to do,
And work there is for me and you:
But I'll not take the fatal wine,
And wreck the immortal soul divine;
O, comrades, when we're tempted so,
God give us strength to answer, No!

PATHOS, POVERTY, PRIDE.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "WITHIN IRON BARS" "EDGAR WARNER," ETC.

Had she struck him in his face he could not have been more astonished and angry, but she reasoned and plead for the sake of his wife and children, and as the tears washed her face in her agony of fear of failing to convince him, he grew more quiet and thoughttul listening to her explanations of their manner and methods of dealing with cases like his, and for all he deemed it unnecessary, yet the inward craving made him feel it might be an easier victory and sure while his strength outside might fail. So as they passed a retreat well known for the reception of gentlemen, he bade her good bye for a time and entered its door, for she had already made provision for their receiving him.

"Where is Bryant auntie" said Mary in alarm as Mrs. Blake entered the door without him.

"In the Washingtonian Home. And now Mary pack up your things and go home with me for a while. It was Bryant's wish."

* * * * * * *

Three years after Mrs. Blake visited Mary Halstead again. Her business was ended successfully and $10,000 had been placed in Halstead's hands.

She laughingly said she would have to rub her eyes to see if she wasn't dreaming for here was the home as she had first seen it. All the handsome furniture had been replaced, the flowers were in the window, and the fire in the grate. The books in the book case were all at sixes and sevens, and the door had an ugly habit of flying open and striking one's nose as they approached it, that she said destroyed the illusion.

She rubbed her eyes in earnest as Mr. Halstead entered the room, for the erect manly form and clear honest eye bore so little resemblance to the uncertain hesitaking figure that so willingly shut himself up for home and heaven's sake.

He was enthusiastic in praises of the Home, and its power of assisting weak wills, and said should he ever be overcome again, which now seemed impossible, he should hasten at once to its doors. And Mary stood smiling by as he talked, her heart too full for utterance.

GIRLS IN COUNCIL.

BY NARCISSA E. WHITE.

"Going to a young ladies' meeting! Well, it certainly would be a sight worth seeing,—a company of girls trying to hold a business meeting!" laughingly exclaimed a gentleman friend a few days ago when I intimated that, having one evening "off duty" in my two weeks' lecture engagement in Philadelphia, I proposed to spend that evening in visiting the business meeting of the society under whose auspices I labored, i. e., the Philadelphia Young Woman's Christian Temperance Union. And as I sat that night in said 'business meeting' I was so firmly persuaded that my gentleman friend was right, it was "a sight worth seeing," that I only wished I could bring in all the poor tired workers of the mother W. C. T. U. to gain new inspiration from the sight of these earnest enthusiastic young faces, and also bring in all the half-hearted, derisive skeptics of the land, to show them how girls do conduct a "business meeting." But as I could not bring even "the sisterhood" there, let me try to do the next best thing—give you a pen picture of it:

Imagine, then, a beautiful parlor in the beautiful home of the president, Mrs. Wm. Patten. A parlor adorned with choicest works of art, and souvenirs of travel, but this evening made even more attractive by the presence of some fifty bright, handsomely dressed girls, for, as the president quietly remarked, "We love the temperance cause so much we always give it our very best—write temperance notes on our best paper, and wear our best clothes to its meetings." In addition to these fifty young ladies were some ten or twelve young gentlemen.

Punctually at the hour for the meeting the president took her seat behind a small table at one side of the room; the vice presidents seated themselves at her right, the secretaries at her left. A few appropriate passages of scripture were read, then all kneeled reverently, a few moments were spent in silent prayer and then the president's voice rose in audible words, thanking the dear Father for specific blessings, i. e., the increased membership of the union, the health of the members, the contributions to their treasury; and then asking for specific requests, i. e., directions in their plans of work, blessings upon each line of work, and a general awakening in the city,—in short my idea of what real prayer is. Then began the regular program of the meeting.

The recording secretary called the roll and read the number of the last meeting. The financial secretary read (as this union's constitution requires) a full report of all monies received, all calls made by members of the union in behalf of temperance work, all letters written, all literature distributed. The treasurer reported the amount of money in the treasury at the beginning of the month, monies received, the orders drawn on the treasury up to date, and the balance remaining. When these three reports were given all had a very clear idea of the general condition of the union.

Reports from standing committees were called for: First, report from chairman of ward work. "Ward work? what kind of work could that be?" I mentally asked, but my mind was soon put to rest when a fine looking young man rose and read (all the reports were in writing) a carefully prepared statement of the attempt made to canvass systematically the different wards of the city and introduce temperance papers and other temperance literature, the successes and failures of the plans adopted, and then the report closed with the sensible recommendation that the union shall employ good conscientious canvassers, at a regular salary, to solicit subscriptions to THE UNION SIGNAL, the National Temperance Advocate and other worthy temperance papers. This suggestion was afterwards adopted.

The chairman of petition work then read a report and I soon learned by this report that this enterprising union was taking "time by the forelock," and already was circulating petitions to the next winter's legislature, for a prohibitory amendment are also now waiting anxiously for the petitions for scientific temperance literature issued by the state chairman of that department, and which they will likewise circulate. The chairman of temperance news gladdened our hearts by reading the declarations in favor of prohibition by ex-Attorney Gen. Palmer, the active efforts put forth by the ministers of Wilkesbarre for the suppression of saloons and the consternation manifested by the liquors sellers of that place. Also news from New York, Canada and other places.

But space will not permit me to give a full outline of all the reports, the autograph pledge album, the "special committees," the plans for new fields of labor, but I can not overlook the librarian's, Miss Babcock, daughter of Rev. D. C. Babcock of the National Temperance Society. Her report of books taken from the library gave us a clear idea of the kind of mental food indulged in by "these girls." "Temperance lectures on Alcohol," by Richardson, "Alcohol and the Brain" "Alcohol and the State" by Pitman, etc., etc. Evidently these girls mean not only to have, but also be able to give "a reason for the faith that is within them." But delightful as this systematic, comprehensive way of conducting a business meeting was, inspiring as was the view of real, telling work done during the month as shown by the various reports, one of the chief charms of the meeting to me was, the bright, witty and humorous spirit that seemed to prevade the whole meeting. Nothing dull, nothing tedious. Even the most routine business was conducted with a vivacity and sparkle that made us forget it was mere routine business. I did not wonder that at the close of the business hour, when the "social hour began," one girl said to another in my hearing, "Don't we have good times in our union? I don't want to miss a meeting."

And I am so happy to say the president of this union, Mrs. Patten, to whom largely the credit of making this union what it is, is now also superintendent of Y. W. C. T. U. work for the state of Pennsylvania.

WORDS FITLY SPOKEN.

BY ROSE RICHART.

"O, auntie, I shall see so many people today, what shall I say to them all!" laughingly exclaimed a gay young girl, as she entered the room of her invalid aunt. "I must go down town on several errands for mamma, this morning, and papa's old friend, with his son and nephew, are to be here to dinner, you know. Then Susie Lane and I intend to call on some of the girls, and, finally, some of Fanny's friends will be here tonight. But I must really pause for breath. I do wish Fanny had not invited that haughty Miss St. John, for I have promised to add my mite towards entertaining them. Do you know, auntie, it always seems to me that Miss St. John has some great trouble to bear; though what it can possibly be, I know not. She is rich, handsome, talented, and appears to have many friends in spite of her haughtiness. But you have not yet told me what I shall say to them all—from Bridget Rooney up to Miss St. John and that stately old Mr. Seymour," and she merrily kissed the pale cheek of her aunt.

"Dear Edith," she answered earnestly, "'a word fitly spoken is like apples of gold in pictures of silver.' Can you not speak a few works that will bring forth fruit?"

"But auntie," and her face flushed, "I am so young and weak."

"God grants wisdom liberally to all that ask of him," and a silent prayer went up to heaven that she might be guided and aided:

A few months later Edith entered her aunt's room with a letter in hand. There were tears in her eyes as she said:

"Auntie, I have received a letter that made me very happy. It is from that Mr. Gray, who used to be here occasionally. He is now in St. Louis, and writes that he has lately joined the church. He says, 'Miss Edith, I date my first really serious thoughts about religion to that conversation I had with you the last time I was at your house.' Don't you remember that little talk we had one Saturday morning some time ago? Well, Mr. Gray, with several others was here that night, and it happened that he and I were alone at one end of the parlor, looking at some beautiful Easter cards, when we naturally began talking about religion. Your works flashed into my head, and although it cost me a great effort, I talked to him unreservedly. Just as I was saying that I thought one could be much happier when a Christian, and was repeating that verse, 'The peace of God which passeth all understanding shall keep your hearts and minds,' Miss St. John drew dear.

"'Do you really believe that?" she asked, almost sternly.

"I felt my face flush, but looked directly into her eyes, and answered, 'I do believe it.'

"Pernaps you remember that the next week she invited me to her home in order to see her paintings. I have not spoken of it before, but while there she asked me many questions about my faith in God. How glad I was then that you had me learn so many 'trust verses.' 'He shall deliver thee in six troubles: yea in seven there shall no evil touch thee,' she asked me to repeat again.

"Yesterday when I asked Bridget Rooney if her lame Pat was any better, she said, 'Faith and he hasn't forgot them words you spoke to him when you come that mornin' to see about the wurrk, and he hasn't anything he thinks so much of as them cards with the pretty verses on them.'

"It makes me very happy, auntie, to think that I have been of any use at all, but I do not forget that this happiness is due to your 'words fitly spoken,'"

TOPIC: ABSTINENCE FOR THE SAKE OF OTHERS.

LESSON TEXT.—I. Cor. 8: 1-13.

GOLDEN TEXT.—If meat make my brother to offend I will eat no flesh while the world standeth. I. Cor. 8: 13.

TIME.—A. D. 57.

PLACE.—Written from Ephesus.

1. What an antithetic commentary on some temperance teaching is this silence of Paul's. Knowledge puffeth up, but love buildeth up. A man wise in his own conceit agrees to control his appetite for his own sake. A loving brother agrees to abstain for love's sake, thus building up his weak brother. Mere knowledge is not a safe guide when unaccompanied by that charity which "beareth all things". Wisdom unsalted by the tender grace of Christian love is a dry and often bitter thing. Those strong, wise disciples of the early church who ate the meat offered to idols just as freely as if it had been bought "in the shambles" could not build up the feeble mind and tender conscience of the Christian who felt that eating the meat presented at idol altars was giving countenance to idolatry.

2. The law of the stumbling block is as much one of God's laws as if enumerated in the decalogue. It is to the modern Greeks, foolishness often, but none the less God lays it upon our consciences. And Christ himself commits to our care the weak brother for whom He died.

3. With this general law once laid down, we are left to the dictates of conscience, reason, love, for its individual application. May God help each one of us so to decide that no weak brother shall charge upon us his downfall and ruin. Especially does the Christian church need to be of this mind, in regard to the use of fermented wine at the communion. The weak brother in this case is so often betrayed and that at the table of his Lord.

A NEW AND WHOLESOME DOCTRINE.

Not newer however than the old saying of an old poet who in ridicule of many prescriptions of physic, asks

> "And what at last shall gain by these?
> Only a costlier disease.
> That which makes us have no need
> Of physic, that's physic indeed!"

Alcohol and its compounds certainly will not fall under this class of physic, and it is a pleasant thing to note that the Boston Journal of Chemistry and Popular Science News in its April issue comes out editorially in the statement that spirituous liquors are not needed in medicine or the arts. Not that alcohol may not be sometimes convenient, or even useful, but is not indispensable or necessary in the two great departments when it has hitherto been regarded as the one accessible vehicle for the processes of chemistry or the solution of drugs. The article in question also decides that no necessity of household or domestic applications of alcohol exists; that the alcoholic solutions of camphor, peppermint, paregoric and the tinctures once found on the top pantry shelf or in the family medicine chest, are remedial agents of very doubtful efficacy; that camphor as a drug is not needed in any household save as an insecticide; that hot or cold water serve the purpose of an embrocation far better than alcohol— that even the bay rum of the toilet table is a useless appendage.

As to the need of alcohol in the drug store, this high authority maintains that it is no longer needed to hold the active principles of opium, Peruvian bark or other drugs and vegetable products; the most effective of these, like quassia, gentian, senna, rhubarb, etc., yielding their beneficience to water as easily as to alcohol. And since the active alkaloidal and resinoidal principles of roots, barks, and gums have been isolated, and put in better and more convenient forms, there is no longer need of alcoholic tinctures and elixirs.

In the laboratory, the question "How to dispense with alcohol," may be not so easily disposed of, yet even here, says the writer in the Popular Science News, if the article were banished entirely, such exile would not deprive us of a single one of the indispensable agents which modern civilization demands; neither would chemical science be retarded by its loss.

Modern science has given us glycerine, naptha and sulphate of carbon, carbolic acid and a hundred other agents which can take the place of alcohol in a very large number of appliances and processes. In the manufacture of ether and chloroform where alcohol is most indispensable, it may be produced simultaneously with these agents.

For the naturalist, cheaper and equally good material for preserving his specimens have already come into use.

Neither city nor household depend longer on alcohol for purposes of illumination. The petroleum well and the coal bed have driven it from the market.

The dictum of medical science is fast being pronounced against the wines and liquors of commerce as medicinal agents, and in all cases of disease when an alcoholic stimulant would seem beneficial, other agents are now offered to the practitioner which serve an equally useful purpose, and have none of the evils of the alcohol train. The results of scientific researches are on our side. The experiment of medical practice entirely without alcohol has been successfully carried on in the London temperance hospital for seven years, and is now no longer experiment but scientific theory. Of the need of such an institution in our own country and its immediate inception we shall have more to say next week.

SHAM JOURNALISM.

The shame and sham of Chicago's daily journalism have enjoyed a climax the past week. One daily presents its readers with what purports to be a lengthy communication by Matthew Arnold to the Pall Mall Gazette, and forwarded to it by cable, the same being in abuse of this city, its pulpit and pew, its people in literature and in society; sneering at the mercantile class and insulting the best known preacher; and all good people feel enraged at being thus outraged by their late foreign guest of note.

CHAPTER II: The next day other Chicago dailies, religious journals and the secular press of the entire country are allowed to pick up the cudgel and pound Mr. Arnold with the full catalogue of harsh epithets, and conclude all English visitors of repute are snobs, thus at once placarding the country with gross slander of this most marvelous city of the world and writing down a man of former good name, a barbarian before two continents.

CHAPTER III. Another day and a rival daily declares that the said "Arnold letter" was written in its office, and publication secured by it in the New York Tribune on Sunday April 6, with foreign credit line, to catch a rival offering reprint as a "special cable dispatch;" and that said rival had the same telegraphed forward for its issue of Monday. And this latter paper crows over the fraud and boasts itself a liar as a good joke, and of great service to its readers.

So, if the daily be not lying when it rejoices in having lied, we have this new code of morals for the conduct of the daily press of this city, and the instruction of future journalists, as well as of foreign contemporaries in whom conscience is a plant of slower growth. To checkmate with a laugh the bogus enterprise of a competing journal, it is worthy of all praise; to palm upon the public the grossest sham on record; to spoil public confidence in a rival, it is necessary only to lay before the people a falsehood of most cruel and extended disaster, then brag in large capitals; for the sake of a joke on Madison street it is highly honorable in Fifth avenue to slander a great city full, to bite the hand that has given it bread, to personally malign some of its most respected citizens, to filch from a great foreigner his good name and make it the target of hate and acrid abuse.

"Jokes" that so wound are outrageously wicked; they cannot be healed. Doctors who should infect the multitude with jaundice to catch a rival administering dough pills for biliousness, then chuckle aloud over their infamous device, would not be long popular. Nor when the daily press takes pay for bread has it any right to feed the public on cotton biscuit. If this city will not be what the swindle painted her, let her demand journalism with a conscience. With the ubiquitous daily press a constant schoolmaster in falsehood, the other crimes find more and apter pupils.

---

The going forth of scientific temperance education is the sound in the mulberry trees of today. The law of Vermont, New Hampshire and Michigan goes into effect this month, while New York with the prompitude of "empire" has made her law effective within twenty days after passage. The school book publishers are in what the redoubtable "Jo March" would call a "buzz". Let it be remembered however by all our W. C. T. U. constituency that the only book that has up to this time received the endorsement of W. C. T. U. authority, is Professor Dorman Steel's Hygienic Physiology, noticed in our issue of April 3, which has been prepared with strict adhesion to total abstinence orthodoxy, and has the sanction of eminent scientists as well as W. C. T. U. philanthropists. Mrs. Hunt has given time and money to this work in order to secure the most correct teaching, but has no other connection with the book than this earnest and unselfish purpose. An edition prepared for intermediate grades will be forthcoming early in May.

---

Apropos of the above, is the following letter from Miss Willard who had previous to the appearance of Prof. Steel's Hygienic Physiology, personally endorsed a book of supposed similar intent, but which proves to be vastly inferior, as all the temperance instruction is "tacked on" at the end of the regular chapters, and can thus be easily omitted and ignored by the unprincipled instructor. Miss Willard says:

Dear Editor:—Please state to our women that any endorsement of scientific text books for the temperance education contemplated by Mrs. Hunt's department, must have her signature to be satisfactory to the National W. C. T. U. I shall henceforth commend no book of this class until I have consulted with Mrs. Hunt, for we must all "pull together" in this matter or we shall fail to "get the best." Mrs. Hunt will soon make full announcements in the columns of The Union Signal.

Frances E. Willard.

And still further on this important matter bears the opinion of Superintendent Ruggles, of the New York board of public instruction, who has issued a circular interpreting the effects of the scientific temperance instruction law recently enacted. In his opinion, the act applies to all district schools, union free schools, public schools organized under special statutes in cities and villages, normal schools, Indian reservation schools, and separate neighborhood schools. The instruction required is not to be confined to the high grades, as thereby many pupils would fail to receive the special instructions the legislature intended they should have, but it applies to all pupils in the above named schools, to state pupils in all institutions for the instruction of the deaf, dumb and blind, and to pupils in such asylum schools as share in the appointment of the public school money. Thus at one grand sweep is the New York of tomorrow pre-empted for intelligent sobriety.

It is a little bit peculiar that the first woman in America to petition a legislative body for the right to vote was a southern lady, or one who sought a home in the southern colony of the new world. History says it is true, however, and that Margaret Brent, born in 1600, coming to America with the party of Lord Baltimore, was on the death of Lord Baltimore's brother, Leonard Calvert, between whom and herself existed strong ties of affection, by his verbal will left in charge of his estate. The courts sustained her in carrying out the will of the deceased regarding property matters, but, when she pressed her claim as the representative of Lord Baltimore and Leonard Calvert, to two votes in the general assembly, she failed to carry her point.

It was at Fort St. John's, on January 21, 1648, that she made this memorable demand of the colonial legislature of Maryland, and stood forth as the pioneer petitioner for woman suffrage in America.

Frankfort, Ind., is having a temperance revival under the ministrations of James M. Dunn. So says that "princess of the blood royal" Mary E. Balch.

Temperance boys do indeed "shine for all"—at least this is the motto of the St. Paul Star, a very creditable amateur publication, gotten up by the son of our good worker, Mrs. P. B. Groat.

Mrs. Woodbridge addressed the Ohio legislature March 21, in behalf of prohibition and scientific temperance instruction. She was brought face to face with the whole body unexpectedly, when only preparing to speak before a committee, but was as she always is, equal to the situation, and made a most exhaustive plea for legislation in the interest of country, home and the kingdom of heaven.

In the death of Mrs. Horace Waters, of New York, an earnest philanthropist is lost to the ranks and a lovely Christian wife and mother to her home.

Mrs. Frances E. W. Harper has been making full proof of her ministry as superintendent of work among the colored people of the north, in Washington, D. C.

One inquisitive woman wonders where all the wise, bright and witty women who write for The Union Signal come from. Why "Out of the everywhere into here."

It is sad to chronicle Mr. John B. Finch's continued illness—and that of a dangerous character. That he is no worse at this writing leads us to hope that he is better.

"Injure soul" is the latest epithet applied to the blatant apostle of infidelity at $350 per night. It comes from a good Presbyterian minister of Ottawa, Ill. in a recent sermon on "Is Christianity a failure?"

The Carthage (Mo.) W. C. T. U. held a twelve hour prayer meeting—from 6 a. m. till 6 p. m. on election day. The church bells rang off the hours and each stroke of the bell "tolled" off a vote from the saloons. The saloons of Carthage must be destroyed—was the heroic motto of these modern Romans.

Mrs. H. R. Smith, of Chicago, a valiant soldier temporarily disabled and on furlough in San Antonio, Texas, is busy for temperance notwithstanding. She spoke for the W. C. T. U. recently organized there on a recent Sunday evening, and good results followed as a matter of course. Be kind to her, gentle sisters of the Gulf—we cannot spare her long.

Mrs. Stroud Smith the beloved faith teacher who has sojourned in Chicago during the past winter, giving helpful stimulus to so many lives of faith, sailed last week for Liverpool. Her home is on the Isle of Man—or more properly perhaps—the isle of woman—since there equal rights and privileges prevail. She has given us hope that she will come again, whereat all who know her rejoice.

A wise suggestion comes from a Maryland sister. She says:

Isn't it about time that all the workers in our mighty union "put away their "Mollies" and "Sadies" and "Hatties," etc. with other "childish things" of the past and assumed the more dignified and womanly names, in print at least, which properly belong to them? What would we think of our brothers appearing in print as "Tommy," or "Sammy," or Johnny," or of some of our bright lights thus writing themselves before the world, Mrs. Mollie Woodbridge and Mrs. Judie Foster, for instance.

It is gratifying to find so many who have remembered their "birthright," but there is still room for improvement in this respect, as a reference to the pages of our most welcome weekly visitor will discover. X.

Not in the Watch Tower, beloved—never! That would be hard indeed—after I spent two hours the other day laboring with one of the valuable contributors to the U. S. to change back from "Jennie" to the noble original Jane—and succeeded too. I too believe in the "birthright."

Here is a "bit" showing how California appreciates our workers—and her own, too, for that matter:

I have so often wanted to tell you what a power for good the Southern California W. C. T. U. is. Miss Hathaway is proving an excellent president. I cannot express my love and respect for her. Her sympathy for each struggling sister, her exalted Christian life and faith lift us all nearer to our loving Savior. Mrs. Leavitt is still organizing. The six of us she organized into a union six months ago have increased to twenty-two, which in our small and scattered community is doing well. We are hard at work, expecting large results.

On Duty.

News from the Field.

ILLINOIS.

Tazewell County.—I send a few items of our county convention held at Delevan, February 22. The forenoon session was ably presided over by Mrs. E. M. Strait, of Delavan, the afternoon and evening by our local president, Mrs. J. P. Barnes. County temperance work and temperance instruction in public schools was ably discussed by the sisters and brothers present. There was an improvised map of Tazewell county with township divisions. The saloons in each township were marked with a red spot, reminding one of a sore spot or cancer. Washington township had six red spots, Groveland one, Morton three, Hopedale two, Little Mackinaw three and Pekin thirty-one, Sand Prairie, Delavan and Boynton, had sweet cider (?) marked with purple spots, a combination of red and blue. At three p. m. between three and four hundred children from the public school led by Mrs. Newman, came with temperance banners and flags, marching down the main street, to the M. E. church; after entering the church and before being seated they sang a beautiful temperance song keeping step to the music. Then other exercises by the children and songs, and Mrs. Kirkpatrick gave them a nice temperance talk.

Evening session, Mrs. Kirkpatrick gave an interesting and instructive address. The truth of her statements was so apparent that even the Presbyterian minister said aloud, "Amen." The M. E. minister, who was most happy to ask for a collection for the cause, said that his Presbyterian brother being in a Methodist church and sister Kirkpatrick being a Presbyterian he thought he could joyously say Amen.

The W. C. T. U. had offered prizes to the boys for the best scrap book on tobacco. Two persevering boys, Eugene Brawner and Freddie Newman, came forward, and received them with very appropriate remarks from Mrs. Kirkpatrick. The scrap books are neat nicely arranged and contain a large amount of information on the subject, and the boys have read every piece. E. E. O.

Piasan.—As an illustration of one of the lines of work we too are pushing, I send you the following:

"The case of Mrs. Kate C. Kingston, of Jerseyville, vs. four saloon keepers, was terminated Wednesday. The jury, after being hung all day long, rendering a verdict in favor of the plaintiff for $500 damages, with costs of about $800 more. The case was tried once before at the September term, 1883, of that city, which resulted in a hung jury. Dr. Kingston husband of plaintiff, had been ruined in health and property, abusing and degrading his family, and the defendants were charged with furnishing him liquor. Prominent wealthy men went on Mrs. Kingston's bond, determined to test the efficiency of the state liquor law. Dr. Kingston was at one time a resident of Gillespie in this county."

Thirteen hundred dollars is quite a haul on their sinews of war isn't it? and I glory in every dollar taken away from the strength of the liquor traffic, and would if I could take every drunkard's wife by the hand and encourage her to "go and do likewise." In this case however I believe the judgment to have been far below what it should have been, as there is no doubt saloon keepers have taken $5 where one is returned.

Mrs. L. M. Darby.

MICHIGAN.

Big Rapids.—The weekly "news from the field," greatly cheers us and we wish to add our mite for Michigan. Since the "crusade" awakening there has been a nucleus for women's work in Big Rapids. With 1877 came Dr. Reynolds with his red ribbon work. His zeal and love for the instrumentalities which had been so potent in his own salvation were effectual in perfecting a reorganization of the W. C. T. U. An attempt was made to rule out these significant initials and replace with "White Ribbon" but it was not successful. Since this time the W. C. T. U. has held firmly to its principles, and has so far as possible, pressed forward in the various lines of work planned by the state and national W. C. T. U. with unflinching loyalty.

The ninth Congressional district in which we belong was organized with this union in 1878. The union carried through successfully a week's work for constitutional amendment with I. C. Bontecou, gave Mrs. S. M. I. Henry a weeks work in her evangelical line and received Mrs. Henrietta Skelton for a week in the early days of her German work in Michigan.

The union also called Francis Murphy about this time, who spoke to a large audience.

The credit and success of measures undertaken are largely due to our excellent president, Mrs. Maria Bennett.

At her suggestion the pastors and churches of the city cheerfully consented to unite in a monthly meeting to be held in the interest of our beloved cause and for which the W. C. T. U. was to be responsible. The people have thus been favored with some of the very best advocates of our cause, among them, Geo. W. Bain, John B. Finch, Prof. A. Dickey, John R. Clark, Capt. Linscott, Geo. Woodford, Mrs. M. T. Lathrap, Mrs. A. S. Benjamin, Mrs. J. Ellen Foster, Mrs. M. H. Hunt, Miss L. E. F. Kimball, Mrs. Nellie Bayley, Miss Rulison, Mrs. Baxter, and Miss Willard.

Gospel temperance meetings were held on Sabbath afternoon for many weeks on the premises of the G. R. & I. Ry. depot, and evangelistic work in our county jail was carried on by Mrs. Bennett for a long time. Several hundred prisoners, almost the whole number men in early life, and brought to this sad estate by strong drink, received from her a short lesson from the Word of Life and heard prayer offered for their deliverance.

Children's work has not been altogether neglected. The large hospital in our city in charge of Sisters of Mercy made a department of flower mission especially practicable; temperance Sunday school lessons have been put in the hands of our pastors and Westminster Presbyterian church has adopted them for review days. There are hopeful signs that others will do so.

The sum total of monies received and used in our work for the last four years ending March 9, is $949.21 and as this is very largely made up of voluntary offerings we can but be very grateful to the generous people of our city. The celebration of July 4,1883, was wholly in the hands of the temperance people here. The W. C. T. U. furnished powder for salutes and hired the speaker, Mrs. Lucy Simpson. The Good Templars furnished afternoon games and fireworks for evening.

Of this the Current of this city said: "The celebration in our city this year was the most creditable one we have known since the centennial. A big celebration now-a-days means nothing more nor less than a big lift financially by saloon keepers, and the long list of drunken staggering celebrators illustrates the patriotism (?) of the originators of the average modern celebration. We say the celebration in Big Rapids this year was a propitious exception; an effort was put forth in the direction of restoring patriotism and love of country."

Petitions have been circulated and notwithstanding the press of other lines we have had ample time to discuss and urge the advisability of working for woman's enfranchisement, that not only upon a petition should she express her choice and judgment in affairs of government.

All the days of prayer appointed by the National have been observed. Interesting public exercises marked the crusade anniversary. We have a pleasant "local habitation" through the generous favor of our citizens.

Julia A. Upton, Cor. Sec.

Gratiot County.—Hoping not to weary your patience but to send you a measure of encouragement, I take liberty to write of W. C. T. U. work. In Gratiot county we have four local unions. The one at Ithaca was organized March 9, 1879, with forty-five members; sixteen have removed. We now hold meetings every alternate Tuesday. Alma and St. Louis unions have been sick almost unto death but now are doing well, coming up to perfect health within the last few months. Breckenridge has kept steadily on, the banner union of the county. We have space in our weekly paper. Some other county papers have given occasional space to our work. We are gaining ground with the press and ministers give us grand support. We organized a county W. C. T. U. Jan. 24, 1884; held our first convention March 26, at St. Louis with a good representation from all organized unions. We hope soon to find a practicable financial basis for county work. In "News from the Field" we read with great interest all reports of county work and "Rural Districts' Needs". We find so much that we should like to do if "we had the money." I do wish that every temperance woman had The Union Signal and would read it, then the local and county work would be easier.

I am asking every temperance worker to pray especially for the county work the last day of each month, and to give four hour's temperance work each week. If they will begin individual work, conservatism as well as apathy will give way and voters will yield to the influence of the W. C. T. U. We have committees on scientific, evangelistic, press work, and finance. These are doing some work in their several departments but need to know more, as we all do, what our privileges are. We are looking for our state president, Mrs. Lathrap, to be with us the second week in April.

Mrs. T. H. Thayer, County Sec.

PENNSYLVANIA.

Allegheny.—In Pennsylvania we are almost too busy to write and tell you what is being accomplished. Our old Keystone state is waking up grandly. The W. C. T. U. reports sixty new unions since the October meeting, and the wonder is, that so many of them are born fully grown and ready for work. We are just now entering on a vigorous campaign for a temperance education bill, and greatly encouraged by its success in New York. Petitions are ready for circulation and Mrs. J. D. Weeks, our state superintendent of this department, will keep us all alive with her circulars and directions for systematic work. The constitutional amendment petitions will also soon be ready, and we have thus abundance of work to prompt every woman to go at it heartily. Here in the western part of the state we have had Mrs. M. B. Reese, doing most faithful service.

It is really hard not to covet some of Ohio's brave women to "go forward" in our state, where we are more conservative, perhaps a little slower, but none the less ready to move surely when once we see the right way.

Mrs. J. R. Nichols too, has lately given us ten days, coming specially in the interest of her National department. She has made hosts of friends wherever she has spoken and if she returns in the fall, as we hope, our people will give her a hearty welcome. We are looking for Mrs. McLaughlin in May, when county conventions will be the order all along the line, and in the meantime hope Mrs. Woodbridge will be able to give us a day or two on her way east. Indeed, we were never more ready for any movement that promises to show the people that the W. C. T. U has not forgotten to act in the capacity of a "pudding stick," and keep things stirred up.

Frances L. Swift.

Oil City.—The meetings that have been held in Temperance Hall the past three weeks, under the auspices of the W. C. T. U., have been a decided success. Mr. McConnell delivered twenty-four lectures discussing the question in all its phases, politically, financially, socially and morally.

Nearly two thousand in this city signed the pledge, a majority of whom were young men— those just starting out in life—though occasionally a grey haired man would put on the red ribbon.

Members of the Y. W. C. T. U. were present every evening, assisting in every way, pinning on the badges and speaking their kindly words of cheer and encouragement.

INDIANA

Indianapolis.—The tenth anniversary of the Central Indianapolis W. C. T. U. was celebrated on Sunday, March 9, at Roberts Park M. E. church, with a children's meeting in the afternoon and a mass meeting in the evening.

In the evening the large auditorium was densely packed, many being unable to gain admittance. The president, Mrs. Dr. Harvey, presided. After singing "Give to the Winds thy Fears," Rev. R. C. Houghton read the 146th Psalm and offered prayer.

An anthem was beautifully rendered by the choir, and the treasurer, Mrs. H. C. Page, submitted her report, showing the total receipts during the ten years to be $10,588.61 with a balance on hand of $115.05.

By request of the president, the annual report was given by Mrs. Wells.

A large amount of literature has been distributed in various ways: Visits were made each Sunday morning—until the small-pox broke out—to the woman's department of the jail and to the station house. Through this department of work and that of "woman's work for woman," there is reason to believe much good has been done. The mission work on Yandes street has been the principal work of the year. The work in the Industrial School was described, the change which has taken place in the appearance, the habits and homes of the little girls taught there. The Sunday school numbering 175, has been a marvelous success. Three gospel meetings have been held weekly and there have been over forty conversions, most of them young men. The Young Men's Union and reading room has grown out of the other work. In short the influence going out from the mission was having a transforming effect on all that part of the city.

Another important branch of work is that among the colored people. The success in this branch of work is due to the earnest, untiring efforts of Mrs. Hill. Women and men have taken a stand for total abstinence who a year ago did not believe in it. And this largely through the influence of the children—nearly 500 of whom are enlisted in the nine Bands of Hope.

The social work has received some attention, several interesting drawing-room meetings having been held. The report was made brief—merely outlining the work—so as to give as much time as possible to Miss Willard.

Miss Frances E. Willard was then introduced and for over an hour held the immense audience spell-bound with her matchless eloquence and masterly arguments.

MISSOURI.

CIRCULAR LETTER: LEGISLATIVE WORK.

Dear Sisters:—If you have not a superintendent of legislative and legal work in your union, will you not appoint one at once give her this work to do?

I. Enclosed you will find some letters which I hope you will use all due effort to present personally to all candidates for any office in your state, county, town or ward; accompanying the letter with whatever earnest fervent appeal you can. Will you not do this in a spirit of love rather than bitterness, which is forbidden to any true worker for Christ? Womanly tact and a kind heart will win far more.

Please have this letter to candidates published in your newspapers, and try to influence public opinion. Ask to have their answers sent to you and publish them or not at your discretion in your papers. Liquor sellers know their men, and we can not trust this sacred cause to men that have not the courage of conviction. Please keep the letters in your union, and send abstracts to me.

Every candidate won for prohibition hastens the ultimate victory, and yours may be the voice of persuasion that will secure the needed ones that will make the balance incline towards prohibition. If you need arguments to quicken your zeal, go to some drunkard's wife and listen to her story until you are ashamed of your lethargy and will make any personal sacrifice to secure deliverance for our homes.

II. Please paste this declaration of intentions at the head of a sheet of paper and carry it to every voter, urging him to sign it, so as to form a compact body for prohibition? Please keep a book in which to copy the names and P. O. addresses of those signing these declarations and send the declarations with signatures and P. O. addresses to me.

Agitate, agitate, agitate, "the King's business requireth haste."

If we can induce good men to attend the primaries and secure prohibitionists to the conventions and the legislature, we will gain the cause.

Dear sisters, will you not go on your knees for this work, and will you not go to it from your knees? If you can not for any cause do this work, will you not see that some gentleman, a faithful prohibitionist, does it for you, and send the result to me.

Write me from time to time of your success, or if you need further instructions.

Yours, for God and home and native land,

ANNA C. SNEED,

Legislative and Legal Supt., Mo. W. C. T. U.

Kirkwood, Mo.

DECLARATION OF INTENTIONS.

We, the undersigned, hereby declare our intention

I. To vote at the coming state election for such men, and such men only, as will agree to enforce the existing laws of the state and city, while they are laws.

II. We will also vote only for such candidates to the legislature, as will vote for the submission to the people of a constitutional amendment forever prohibiting the manufacture and sale of alcoholic and fermented liquors as beverages.

III. We agree to attend the primaries of our respective parties and see if we can not hold the balance of power by a firm adherence to these principles, and secure the nomination of trustworthy submissionists or prohibitionists.

VERMONT.

CIRCULAR LETTER: PLAN FOR INSTITUTES.

The executive committee of the W. C. T. U., of Vermont, desiring the progress of the department work, have outlined the appended program which they most cordially recommend to the county presidents for their annual institutes. Any other county meetings held during the year can vary program, but at institutes it is considered best to have a uniform program as far as possible, that the work may advance according to same plan.

This plan presupposes that each county has twelve women who will take responsible places, or that one will take several.

Each teacher or person presiding at question box, shall, if she chooses, secure help in her department, engaging as many as she wishes to assist her in class exercises, thus dividing the work. She shall provide these persons to take part, some time before the institute, that they may have time for preparation and study.

Unions are desired to take up subjects as outlined at their regular meetings, thus preparing themselves for the work of the institute. It is hoped that ladies who are called upon by the county president or teachers will feel the responsibility of responding to the call. Let every worker stand with her armor on, ready for action. The vice president should as soon as possible commence plans for work.

1. To organize in every town in the county, and then to enlist all to help in institute work.

Superintendents of state departments are requested to study their department with a view to assisting in the work of the institutes.

Persons to whom parts are assigned are at liberty to to consult the state superintendent of the department.

Let busy thoughts be at work during the winter days that at our spring awakening our songs may be full of cheer and life-giving strains. Let a triumphant chorus gladden the ranks of the W. C. T. U. of Vermont. Remember this is our jubilee year. We wish to go up to our yearly feast at Middlebury, with joy bringing our sheaves with us. Let the sweet singers, those who spin the fine gossamer thread of thought, those who watch and pray, be ever mindful of us, and our work, this anniversary year. MRS. E. G. GREENE, President.

MRS. J. L. PERKINS, Secretary.

CIRCULAR LETTER: SCIENTIFIC TEMPERANCE INSTRUCTION.

DEAR FELLOW WORKERS:—Again I come to you, bringing this time, definite words of good cheer, officially endorsed by the N. W. C. T. U. One book of the proposed series of physiologies is nearly ready; it will probably be issued early in April. It is a revised edition of "Fourteen Weeks in Physiology," by the well known author, Prof. J. D. Steele of Elmira, New York. The revision is being made "under the careful and prayerful oversight of the National superintendent of this department." The practical test of school room use for years, has taught me the value of the existing editions of the book, and the proof-sheets show that the author is making marked impovements in the new.

Strong and clear in regard to "stimulants and narcotics," (including alcohol, tobacco, opium, chloral and chloroform,) the treatment of these vital points is not in a chapter by itself—a temperance appendix to an ordinary physiology—a by-path marked "Private way, dangerous passing,"—on the contrary, it forms a part of the regular hygienic teaching. For example, when the pupils have learned the anatomy and workings of the heart, they are taught its laws of hygiene, including the effect of alcohol, as well as tight clothing upon the circulation.

You will soon receive circulars from the publishers. I know you need no urging to continue the work so grandly begun, to examine this book carefully, and, if satisfied with it, to do your utmost to secure its general adoption in your schools. It is prepared for pupils in the upper classes of district and graded schools; a primary book will probably appear later.

Will each one who receives this circular please send me as soon as possible after election, the name of the text-book committee in your town? Please, also, sisters of the unions, if you have not already done so, send me the name of your local superintendent of scientific instruction, and direct her to inform me promptly of the decision of the text-book committee on this matter, when made.

Will it be nothing to hear as we learn, perchance, over the battlements of heaven, the shout of glad voices of boys and girls, "We are coming—huzza! huzza! the bright hope of the morning is in our faces, the vigor of a temperate youth is in our bodies, the strength of a pure life is in our brains—America's hope, America's salvation?" Yours in faith and labor,

ALICE M. GUERNSEY.

FLORIDA.

REPORT OF STATE CONVENTION.

The Woman's Christian Temperance Union of the state of Florida met in the Library Hall, at Jacksonville, February 28, 1884, at 9 a. m. The convention was called to order by the president of the state union, Mrs. Walter Gwynn, of Jacksonville, and was opened with singing, reading and prayer, after which the convention was given into the charge of Mrs. S. F. Chapin, of Charleston, S. C., superintendent of the temperance work of the W. C. T. U. in the south.

Mrs. Reed, of Jacksonville, gave a hearty address of welcome to all visiting the union in any capacity, and bade us go onward in our work, with the assurance that although the evil we are trying to overcome is powerful, the power of Christ is stronger, and through Him we must conquer.

Mrs. Dr. Gary, of Ocala, emphasized the fact that our armor consists of the triple forces of work, words and prayer, in her response to the address of welcome.

As the hour of eleven had arrived a consecration service was held, conducted by Mrs. Hannah Whitall Smith. After singing and prayer she gave a very instructive lesson in regard to efficiency in our work, making it dependent upon our being filled with the Spirit, or being baptized with the Holy Ghost, and gave illustrations from personal experience and observation. Her address was followed by interesting testimony from delegates and others.

Our visiting brethren were then introduced to the audience, and a hearty resolution of approval was presented and read by the Grand Scribe of the Sons of Temperance, from the order.

At 3 p. m. the convention met according to adjournment, and was opened with singing and prayer. The corresponding secretary, Mrs. G. B. Griffin, then read a very interesting report of the state union, and though it is not a year since its organization, the report presented many encouraging features.

In reference to the result of the local option law, Mrs. Griffin said: The local option law of our state, procured as it was through the efforts of temperance women, should commend itself most earnestly to all of our sister workers. In some places in the state where there are no unions there comes the glad message to us, "We are fighting to sustain the local option law;" and there are many places in the state where there is not a saloon, and where no liquor is sold. Madison, Eustis, Altoona, Leesburg, Interlachen, Hawthorne and Fairbanks are all mentioned as being of that number.

Mrs. Chapin gave a thrilling account of her manner of conducting the Band of Hope with the children of her place, with some touching illustrations of children's work, and advised the workers by all means to engage in juvenile work, in young woman's work, and in the introduction of temperance literature into our public schools.

The following resolution was then offered by Mrs. Lord, of Savannah, and was adopted:

WHEREAS, The evils of the drink traffic strike deepest into the homes of the wives, mothers and sisters of the land, carrying blight to the hearthstone and the family circle, and heart-broken wives, blasted hopes, ruined reputations, desolate homes, ruin and misery, follow in its train. None suffer so deeply as the women. Therefore be it

Resolved, By the Florida Woman's Christian Temperance Union in session, in the name of God, home, and native land, we have gone into this work as a heart work, never to cease our efforts while this life shall last, or until this traffic of strong drink shall be driven away from our fair land, state and nation, accepting no compromise whatever. Nothing short of prohibition will satisfy us.

Mrs. Dr. French was next introduced, and delivered a stirring address.

Miss L. Tucker gave an account of the jail work in Jacksonville, stating it to be the presenting of the gospel in a simple way to the prisoners.

Mrs. Lord then addressed the audience on the crusade work of the northwest.

A report was read from the Young People's society of Riverside (suburb of this city), showing an active interest in the temperance cause.

The convention then adjourned, to meet at 9 o'clock the next morning.

In the evening a meeting was held in the Trinity M. E. church. Mrs. Chapin delivered an instructive address, and was followed by Mr. James G. Thrower, of Atlanta, Ga., editor of The People's Advocate.

SECOND DAY'S PROCEEDINGS.

The convention met at 9 a. m. Mrs. Davis conducted the opening exercises of singing, reading the 86th psalm, with comments and prayer.

Mrs. E. L. Goodhue, superintendent of juvenile work, read a very interesting report respecting the Bands of Hope, both among white and colored children.

Of the fifteen local unions all but one or two have been recently organized, and have not as yet taken hold of juvenile work.

Ocala reports a Band of Hope of fifty members.

From Lake City we have, "We are very much interested in our Band of Hope, also the one at Brooklyn. These together number about one hundred pupils."

Miss Tucker, superintendent of jail work and a teacher in Duval grammar school, has recently secured the names of 125 pupils to the total abstinence pledge.

Our colored friends in this city, since June last, have organized Bands of Hope in their various churches and their schools have done them great credit. Ebenezer M. E. church organized June 18 with fifty pupils. It now numbers 315 with an average attendance 188.

The African M. E. church has a Band of Hope numbering 115 members, and the Bethel church reports one with twenty or thirty members.

Resolutions were adopted expressing the firm conviction that "the traffic in intoxicating liquors is an evil, and that continually, at war with the sacred interests of individuals and society; antagonizing morality, education and religion; producing disease, poverty, lawlessness and crime; filling our jails, almshouses and asylums with inmates at public expense; subverting the family, social and religious influences; carrying unnumbered thousands of our noblest and best to drunkards' graves, and that the only remedy for this gigantic evil is total abstinence and prohibition."

That the co-operation of ministers of the gospel, public, private and Sunday school teachers, must be secured. That the society would sustain only those dealers who are known to neither sell nor furnish, as a beverage, intoxicants to their customers.

That all possible influence should be used to secure the enforcement of the excellent local option law throughout the state.

That the thanks of this society be tendered the judges, legislators and commissioners who have so nobly sustained the local option law, and the newspapers throughout the state that have so wisely advocated it.

That the officers of state and county fairs be requested not to encourage the manufacture of intoxicating liquors by offering premiums for wines, etc., and that they discard that department from their list of exhibits.

That an appeal be made to all religious, educational and sanitary organizations throughout the state to aid in this work.

That inasmuch as it is essential to have information and facts spread broadcast throughout our state and land, each member of the union be urged to act as an agent in spreading the best temperance literature among the people—recommending the national organ, "The Union Signal."

The plans of work recommended by the National were adopted so far as practicable in the several localities.

The president of the state union Mrs. Gwynn, read a beautiful address, full of soul-stirring, onward admonitions. It was adopted by the union, and a vote of thanks passed.

(The editor regrets that she has not space to publish it entire, but is obliged to content herself with brief extracts.)

I recollect reading a sermon not long since called the "ox sermon," with which I was very much struck. It was taken from that passage of scripture which we find in the twenty-second chapter of Exodus, where it says, "If an ox gore a man or a woman that they die, then the ox shall be stoned, but the owner shall be quit. But if the ox were wont to push with his horns in time past, and it hath been testified to his owner, and he hath not kept him in, but he hath killed a man or a woman, the ox shall be stoned, and his owner also shall be put to death." The writer went on to say that the principle of this law is very plain, here applied to a specific case, but extended to many others. That everybody was responsible to God for the evils resulting from his or her selfishness, or indifference to the welfare of others. In this case of the ox goring a man or woman to death, the ox would be stoned, to show how God valued human life—but "if the ox had been wont to push with his horns," and the owner knew it, he had to be responsible for the consequences; so the ox and the owner both had to be put to death. The owner may have said "he couldn't help what his ox did, he had nothing to do with killing the man or the woman." but God said, "he must die!" God held him responsible! In the trial of the owner of the ox, only two questions could be asked—"Was the ox wont to push with his horns? Did the owner know it?"

So, dear friends, does God hold responsible the liquor maker, dealer and those who license its sale. Is intoxicating liquor wont to produce misery, wretchedness and death? Has this been proven to those who make and deal in it as a beverage, and to those who thus legalize its traffic? Undoubtedly, yes!

* * * * * *

The hearts of the dear W. C. T. U. of this town were so gladdened at the response of the legislature to their petition of over two thousand names, and notwithstanding all that has been said to the contrary, the results are encouraging. Let us go over some of them.

For the last six months of 1882, preceding the passage of the law, there were issued special tax stamps as follows: In July, 13; in August, 9; in September, 12; in October, 10; in November, 14; in December, 23; making in all 81. During 1883, for the corresponding six months and after the passage of the law, there were special tax stamps issued as follows: In July, 7; August, 5; September, 2; October. 11; November, 6; December, 5; making a total of 36—less than half of the year before.

I've heard a number of reliable residents of many of our towns say that the past year, since the local option law passed, their Saturday evenings were as quiet as other week days, whereas before there were always brawls and fightings.

Just as I was writing this, a gentleman friend came into the sitting room of my boarding house; and said he was just from Eustis, one of our growing, thriving, railroad towns in South Flordia; and that the doctor there told him he could hardly get liquor to use as a medicine.

* * * * * *

Here and there we may save the drunken, besotted man. By God's grace the leopard spots may be changed, and the brand plucked from the burning; but in working for our children there is always a solid foundation laid for the future.

The late Cardinal Wisemau said: "Give me the children of England, and in twenty years England shall be Catholic." So give us the children of Flordia, and in less time than that, what a grand army of total abstainers we will have! Do not hesitate to get every child we can, both black and white, into a temperance school, and make them sign the pledge.

Some have said we do wrong in making the children sign the pledge. Is it wrong to induce them to do that which will save them from the terrible temptations to which they will sooner or later be exposed? In the name of all that is good and holy, No!

Let us never weary in showing them what that pledge means, in the most entertaining, pleasing and profitable way; then in the place of the thousands upon thousands who fall into the drunkard's grave, we will have noble, clear-brained men and women to fill up the gap."

Mrs. Hannah W. Smith then took the chair, and conducted the consecration services. After prayer, she gave us a beautiful lesson from the growing of the lily. It simply thrives and blooms under the gardener's care. So should we, under our Heavenly Father's care.

The convention then adjourned till 3 p. m.

AFTERNOON SESSION.

The convention met at 3 p. m., according adjournment, and the meeting was opened by prayer. Minutes of the forenoon were read and approved.

Mrs. Smith spoke of the manner of conducting unions, and read and answered questions. Resolutions of courtesy were brought in and adopted.

After which come the election of officers resulting as follows: President, Mrs. J. L. Lyons; corresponding secretary, Mrs. T. P. Gary.

One hundred and fifty children were then admitted, and favored the convention with a temperance song and recitation.

Services were held in the evening in Trinity church. The speakers were Rev. C. H. Mead, Hon. J. W. Stearns and Mrs. H. W. Smith. Greetings to the convention from Mrs. McLeod, of Baltimore, secretary of southern work, were received. A recitation by Mrs. Lord, and excellent music, added to the interest of the occasion.

PENNSYLVANIA.

Johnstown.—Mrs. Marie Radcliffe Butler, wife of Rev. T. D. Butler died at her home in Johnstown, Pa., March 28, aged forty-five years.

She was born in Jordan, N. Y., but most of her life was spent in Louisville, Ky., where she was educated and married. She was a graduate of Louisville high school; her early life was devoted to literature and writing for religious journals. The last nine years of her life was largely spent in gospel, missionary and temperance work. At the time of her death she was president of the Johnstown W. C. T. U., state organizer, and several engagements for temperance work through the state were awaiting her recovery. But the Master transferred her to another sphere.

C. M. W. Foster, Sec.

Meadville.—I do wish you could take a peep at our Band of Hope. I know it would do your eyes good to see over two hundred little ones coming Sabbath after Sabbath to learn of temperance. There is not such a Sabbath school in our city. It is an outgrowth of the Y. W. C. T. U. and reflects great credit on the teacher and officers. Much praise, however, is due to Mrs. Stubbs, their worthy president, who is a live woman, full of energy and perseverance. Not long since, feeling that a chalk talker would add interest to the school, she pressed into service a young lady whom she knew could draw beautifully and has put her designs upon the board, which she selects herself and when the time for review comes, she tells the story and makes the application. It has the anticipated effect, to attract, and each Sabbath the number increases. Yes, our Band of Hope is a success so far. It is a grand work.

"Wharf rat business" I call it, perforating the foundations of the liquor traffic, so that when the wave of temperance sentiment, which is surely coming, sweeps over our land, the whisky fabrications shall fall to the ground.

Lois.

NEBRASKA.

Aurora.—Victory is ours. At our town election for trustees 133 votes were cast for the prohibition ticket, giving us a majority of twenty-six over the license ticket. We were able to secure the services of Rev. F. F. Yeeter and Prof. Hinckins for the entire week previous to election notwithstanding other and larger towns would gladly have secured their services.

The W. C. T. U. circulated handbills publishing the petition of 175 women of Aurora to the voters, asking them to remember the interest of their homes, wives and children and to vote against the rum traffic.

Though we rejoice in this victory yet it is plain that rest comes not yet but we must stand by the men elected, have a watchful interest in the drug stores and keep up a healthy temperance sentiment.

Mrs. A. L. Leonard, Cor. Sec.

NEWS IN A NUTSHELL.

Francis Murphy began a temperance campaign in Freeport, Ill., April 10, under the auspices of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union.

A series of gospel temperance meetings was commenced on Sunday, March 16, under the direction of Mrs. Hill, among the colored people of Indianapolis.

Union Hall, Manistee, Mich., was filled to overflowing on Sunday evening, March 23, by an audience drawn thither to listen to Francis Murphy's lecture upon "Real Life." Large numbers signed his pledge and donned the "badge of blue." Intense temperance sentiment prevails. Mr. Murphy remains three weeks.

The good citizens of Madison, Wis., organized an independent municipal movement looking to the election of city officers committed by character and promise to the enforcement of law. President Bascom, F. J. Lamb, and other well known temperance men and supporters of the W. C. T. U. are prominent in the agitation.

FLOWER MISSION DEPARTMENT.

Will the readers of The Union Signal allow me a few words concerning the esthetic part of the all comprehending work of the N. W. C. T. U. By the kindness of the editor some space will be allotted each week in the columns of this paper to the discussion of the Flower Mission branch of the work. As secretary of Miss Jennie Casseday, national superintendent of this department, I ask the co-operation of the superintendents of Flower Mission work in those states that have been organized, hoping that they will not only cheerfully, but eagerly, avail themselves of this opportunity of telling of results in their own work, and plans for future work for the benefit of those who would like to do something, but need to be enlightened. Also submit any difficulties that may arise in the form of questions which will gladly be answered by Miss Casseday through this column, as the best way of promoting the work with the least possible taxing of her feeble strength.

It is my intention to notify each superintendent of the week her article shall appear in the column, but it will greatly facilitate the work in the beginning if several superintendents would prepare something immediately that there may be no delay. Let the articles be brief and comprehensive. Let us make this column an attractive feature of the paper.

Please send all communications for the column to my address.

Miss Emma Beeler.

ANOTHER
Special Offer.

Arrangements have been made with the publishers by which we are enabled to offer Tunison's Matchless, Historical County, Railroad, Distance and Index Map of the United States, and Illustrated Map of the World, as a Premium upon exceptionally good terms.

A double map, about four by five feet in size, mounted on rollers, bound with tape, colored, varnished and finished in the highest style of the art, with reversible attachment; shows the states on the largest scale possible to give the whole United States on one sheet. The counties are about one inch square, each in separate color, and the names are bold and plain. With each map is supplied, free of cost, a copy of "Tunison's Rapid County Finder, or Index," giving complete index of position and population of every county in the United States, by a superior method, used and adopted in the official publications of the government.

The style of engraving has never before been equaled; the names of the counties and county seats stand out bold and plain, and the diamond lettering enables us to show thousands of stations and postoffices not shown in other maps.

The map was constructed by the most accomplished draughtsmen and engravers, is based on government surveys, official railroad information, and its accuracy is unequaled, four to twenty years newer in design, possessing every quality and merit, and justly deserves the character expressed in its title, "matchless, historical, county, railroad, distance and index map."

This map shows all the new counties correct to date, including the thirty-two (32) new counties made last year. It also shows where every tribe of Indians is located, and gives the number inhabiting each reservation. Also shows all the new western surveys, mining towns and stage stations, and every post office in the west.

The rivers are double lined as far as navigable, enabling us to tell how far boats can ascend any river.

This is also a complete railroad and distance map, giving the names of the railroads printed on them, so we can tell what railroad to take to go to any town or place, and the distance is marked between the stations with figures; thus we can find the shortest route, cost of travel, and exact distance between any two places.

On the reverse side are three complete maps of the world, also separate maps of Europe, Egypt and the Holy Land.

The globular map (in hemispheres) shows the world round, as it actually is, and on a flattened scale, as it appears to us in traveling over it, and is one of the latest and best maps of the world published, showing latest discoveries in the Arctic regions, giving the explorations of the "Hall" and the "Herald Jeannette" expeditions, showing the islands discovered and named by them, within 400 miles of the north pole.

We have in this map the ocean routes of inter-communication, with distances marked from port to port; telegraph cables in the different oceans, and the routes of African explorations from the beginning of this century to those of Livingstone and Stanley.

Below the map of the world is a "Chart of the World," on Mercator's projection, showing voyages of discovery from earliest times to the present date. Names of navigators and the date of the voyages are given alongside each route. The degrees of heat and cold are given by Isothermal lines crossing those countries having same average temperature.

The distribution of races of mankind (illustrated by typical heads, in primary and secondary varieties, as taught by Prof. Guyot), is shown by a system of parallel rulings at different angles, covering the face of inhabited countries. The prevailing religions of the various countries are also shown, defined by different colors. Points of greatest depth in the several oceans, from official soundings are shown.

The small globes show the animal and vegetable life of both continents, arranged according to the zones to which they are native, with explanatory text. Bordering the globular map of the world are the eighty-one flags of the world. In the lower left hand quarter is our diamond map of Europe, and in the lower right hand quarter is our topographical map of the Holy Land, with ancient and modern names, showing modern Egypt in detail, railroad system, Suez Canal, Delta of the River Nile, the Sinaitic peninsula, etc. A map of the ancient world shows the travels of St. Paul, as recorded in Holy Writ, besides names and locations of places mentioned in the New Testament, the route of the wanderings of the Israelites from Egypt into Canaan, is shown according to reliable modern Bible scholars.

The columns on the sides show the different coins used in all parts of the world, giving the value of each in United States money. And in the triangular spaces we have a condensed historical and statistical description of the world. The variations of time in different parts of the world is shown by an original system. Clock dials, fifteen degrees apart, show the time of day at all places on those meridians when it is noon at London and "just the way the clocks tick all around the world." At the top are original illustration showing the costumes, and architectures, also a landscape scene in the principal nations of the world.

This map contains more than 100 illustrations. Among them are views of celebrated places, cathedrals, palaces, etc., of the Old World, and engravings of the government buildings in Washington—apitol, treasury, patent office, postoffice, department of the navy, war, and state, White House, etc., and many engravings of natural scenery, and great engineering works in the United States, with measurements and descriptions. No brief description can do this great work justice. But you can see this map is far ahead of all others. The publisher claims ten improvements: First, the distance marked between stations; second, names on the railroads; third small towns given; fourth, the new counties; fifth, the new surveys; sixth, the "sea shell" tint colors; seventh, rivers double lined as far as navigable; eighth, three maps of the world; ninth, separate maps of Egypt, the Holy Land, Europe; and tenth, the more than 100 illustrations forming a pictorial history of the world, showing what kind of people inhabit each country, styles of their dress, structures they build, houses they live in: a landscape view in each; and the political subdivisions; prevailing religions; degrees of heat and cold; products and exports; animals common there; the flag of the nation; the coins from lowest to highest denomination, and value of each in our money. Then, with the views of palaces, cathedrals, places, cities, etc., we have a complete pictorial history of the world. Retail price of the Map and Index Book, $4.00.

An Efficient Remedy.

In all cases of Bronchial and Pulmonary Affections is Ayer's Cherry Pectoral. As such it is recognized and prescribed by the medical profession, and in many thousands of families, for the past forty years, it has been regarded as an invaluable household remedy. It is a preparation that only requires to be taken in very small quantities, and a few doses of it administered in the early stages of a cold or cough will effect a speedy cure, and may, very possibly, save life. There is no doubt whatever that

Ayer's Cherry Pectoral

Has preserved the lives of great numbers of persons, by arresting the development of Laryngitis, Bronchitis, Pneumonia, and Pulmonary Consumption, and by the cure of those dangerous maladies. It should be kept ready for use in every family where there are children, as it is a medicine far superior to all others in the treatment of Croup, the alleviation of Whooping Cough, and the cure of Colds and Influenza, ailments peculiarly incidental to childhood and youth. Promptitude in dealing with all diseases of this class is of the utmost importance. The loss of a single day may, in many cases, entail fatal consequences. Do not waste precious time in experimenting with medicines of doubtful efficacy, while the malady is constantly gaining a deeper hold, but take at once the speediest and most certain to cure,

BRAIN AND NERVE FOOD.

FROM THE NERVE-GIVING PRINCIPLES OF THE OX-BRAIN and WHEAT GERM.

VITALIZED PHOSPHITES.—Restores the energy lost by nervousness, weakness or indigestion; relieves lassitude and neuralgia; refreshes the nerves tired by worry, excitement or excessive sensitiveness, and strengthens a failing memory. It aids wonderfully in the mental and bodily growth of infants and children. Under its use the teeth come easier, the bones grow better, the skin smoother, the brain acquires more readily and rests and sleeps more sweetly. An ill fed brain learns no lessons, and is excusable if peevish. It gives a more intellectual and happier childhood. It does away with that feeling of weakness and exhaustion which impels to the use of alcoholic beverages, and directly counteracts a cause of depravity and suffering which has baffled the efforts of religion and morality. Not a secret remedy; formula on every label. For sale by Druggists, or mail, $1.

Pilgrim's Progress.

A large edition of this intensely interesting and instructive book has been placed at our disposal by the publishers, and we are enabled to offer it to ou subscribers at a wonderfully low price.

The author's biographer, speaking of the circumstances under which this book was written, says:

Although cut off by his protracted confinement from all opportunity of public preaching, he was, in the overruling providence of God, more extensively useful than while in the enjoyment of unfettered liberty; for having during his leisure hours exerted the extraordinary talents with which he was endowed, he produced the PILGRIM'S PROGRESS—a work which has been more extensively circulated, and done more good in the world than any other book except the Bible alone."

The great popularity of this book is shown in the fact that it has been translated into every language on the continent of Europe.

It should be in every family. Parents can give no better instruction to their children than by laying before them a copy of this excellent book.

Sunday School and Band of Hope Teachers and Superintendents cannot do better than supply each scholar with a copy.

Signal Notes.

We expended $60,000,000 a month, or at the rate of $700,000,000 a year, during the war. Is it strange there was alarm? We expend a little less every year in intoxicating liquors. Ought the alarm to be less?—Christian Home.

INDIGESTION AND CONSTIPATION

ARE CURED BY

AYER'S PILLS.

Dyspepsia

Is one of the most dangerous of the diseases caused by these complaints. Affecting as it does the centre of life—the stomach—it quickly deranges and imperils the whole system, physical and mental. Its symptoms are manifold, and many of them so serious that they are generally regarded and treated as special maladies.

The Only Cure

For the various forms of dyspeptic diseases, is in a medicine that will remove its primary cause, by restoring the stomach, liver, kidneys, and bowels to a healthful condition. Any other treatment is as useless as an effort would be to make a watch keep time by simply gilding its case, when it had a broken main-spring.

Ayer's Pills

Are the best medicine to accomplish the necessary work of cleansing, stimulating and restoring. They are more thorough in their purgative effect than any others, yet are not violent in their action, exercise a powerful influence for good upon the other vital organs as well as the bowels, and effectually

Banish Disease.

For Biliousness, Jaundice, and other evil consequences of hepatic disorders, there is no remedy so prompt and thorough as AYER'S PILLS. They are also, by their efficacy in regulating the digestive functions, of the greatest value to women in the most critical stages of existence.

Kidney Diseases

Also spring from disorders of the digestive functions, and are not only exceedingly painful in themselves, but have symptoms, such as Dropsy and Rheumatism, which are of the gravest character. The work of the kidneys is the purifying of the blood. When, through disease, they cease to do this,

Prompt Relief

Must be accorded to avert most serious consequences. Medicines that lull their pain by dulling their sensibility, or that stimulate them to unnatural activity, do infinitely more harm than good. To restore them to health, the kidneys must be cleansed, their inflammation allayed, and their strength restored.

Ayer's Pills

Do this more effectually than any other. Their diuretic effect is not less marked and beneficial than their purgative power. Not only do they, at once, by a moving dose, free the clogged, and rouse the torpid organs, but their continuous effect, when taken in small doses, is to regulate the machinery of life, and

Restore Health and Vigor

For all the several varieties of Piles, and for the many Cutaneous Disorders produced by Blood Impurities thrown into the circulation during attacks of constipation, no cure is so quick and easy as AYER'S PILLS, which free the bowels and aid nature.

The Union Signal

OFFICIAL ORGAN OF THE WOMAN'S NATIONAL CHRISTIAN TEMPERANCE UNION.

"Thou hast given a banner to them that fear Thee; that it may be displayed because of the Truth; that Thy beloved may be delivered."

VOL. X.—NO. 17. CHICAGO, APRIL 24, 1884. $1 75 PER YEAR.

WITH the issue of this present number, THE UNION SIGNAL enters upon a new departure in advertising. Even with careful attention, notices of unworthy articles have crept into our advertising columns. As surely and as rapidly as their unworthiness has been discovered to us, we have withdrawn them, but desiring to place the National organ of the Women's Christian Temperance Union above reproach in this matter, the publisher of this paper will hereafter hold himself in readiness to refund any money which has been obtained in answer to a fraudulent advertisement in its columns. After a very few now-existing contracts have expired, no medical advertisements will be received at this office. We mean to furnish a perfectly clean and wholesome temperance journal to our patrons.

THE liquor traffic commission has been denied by the United States congress. No absolute monarchy could do more.

A GREAT politician—Benjamin Disraeli—once said:

"Compromise is the soul of littleness, and littleness never produces anything great."

Even policy admits the principle.

THE London Lancet shows how the recent decision of French tribunals against the practice of preserving wine by introducing salicylic acid is likely to increase the exportation of these "doctored" wines across the channel and warns people thereof. American wine drinkers would also do well to have a care.

SAN FRANCISCO has been systematically sown with temperance fact and argument by that earnest prohibitionist, Dr. R. H. McDonald. For the last two years, at his own expense, he has distributed millions of pages setting forth the physical and moral evils of the alcohol and tobacco habit, and besides, conducts personally one of the largest Bands of Hope in the country.

IN the Straits of the Bosphorus as well as those of Gibraltar, there is a surface current flowing one way, and a mighty tide rushing on underneath in an entirely opposite direction. Something of this sort characterizes the narrow political passage in which parties are hemmed in at present. Not a prohibition straw floats on the surface of the stream—but down below surges the resistless flood of popular feeling, and it is in the direction of the entire abolition of the liquor traffic.

NOTE the official communication of our National officers on page 13 concerning the voter's pledge. We have for the past ten years petitioned legislative bodies, only to be scorned. We are done with petitioning this branch of the government. Now we address ourselves to the source of power in the Republic, THE PEOPLE. We appeal to the individual voter. Our cause is with him. See to it that it is well pleaded.

OHIO petitioned the individual voters last fall during her second amendment campaign. Three hundred and fifty thousand of them responded with votes for that amendment.

During the past winter over 200,000 people in that state petitioned the Ohio legislature for a re-submission of the prohibition question and for a compulsory temperance education law. The legislature responded with the insulting proposition to submit a graded license amendment to the people. Women of the W. C. T. U. do you not see where effort pays?

THE day of petition is over. Women have tramped up and down the length of great states securing the cumulative power of many names to a respectful and rightful request to state legislatures. Their labors have been in vain in nearly every instance. "Consecrated common sense" says that effort must be economically expended. It must not be directed where experience shows that only failure awaits it. Legislatures are not at present truly representative bodies. Only as such can petitions be properly expected to receive attention from them. The tendency of the present is toward self representation on the part of THE PEOPLE, at least where all moral questions are concerned. To THE PEOPLE, then, with all our requests. With the individual voter is deliverance.

IN Rockford, Illinois, although prohibition failed to carry the entire city, the least hopeful ward of the city, one in which foreigners most do congregate, recorded a large majority for no license. This result is attributed to the systematic circulation of our No-License Leaflets, written by Professor Foster, and distributed from house to house by an old gentleman who made this his personal contribution to the campaign. He is very feeble in health, but nevertheless would not entrust this canvass to boys, for fear of careless work, and his earnest effort has brought about the desired result. He is the proprietor of a drug store free from all taint or suspicion of alcohol; nor will he sell cigars and tobacco.

THE Rev. James Freeman Clarke, D. D.' advocates graded prisons for drunkards. The term of incarceration to be determined by the progress of the criminal toward permanent sobriety.

CERTAIN Kansas doctors are colluding with the anti-prohibition officials, in order to relieve convicted criminals from imprisonment. In Cawker City two medical men, Aubrotus and Glidden by name, certified that two men sentenced to imprisonment for violation of the prohibitory law, would be endangered in life and health thereby, and the sheriff set them free. THE PEOPLE however demanded their return to "durance vile."

THE Ohio legislature ten days ago adopted the Lowenstein bill which provides for the submission of an amendment to the state constitution by which the liquor traffic in the state is to be regulated (?) by license graded in amount according to the business done by the person or persons engaged in such traffic. The electors voting in favor of said proposition shall have on their ballots the words, "Graded license. Yes," and those voting against said proposition shall have on their ballots "Graded license. No." If the proposition be approved by a majority of the electors voting at the said election, then the amendment shall constitute a part of the state constitution.

THE lamented Keshub Chunder Sen was orthodox on the temperance question. His latest utterance on this topic is full of earnest truthful endeavor to rid India of the universal scourge. He says: "So long as God is with us in this cause we have nothing to fear. Roll, roll back then, O thou fatal tide of intemperance, and swallow no more the fair children of our holy father. Statesmen, patriots, reformers, and philanthropists of England, come and strengthen our hands, that we may, by personal and individual influence, and by joint co-operation, save if possible both India and England from the effects of intemperance. Since the light of religion dawned upon my heart I have never been the least skeptical about the result of human effort in the cause of truth. Whatever is done in the name of God does good and bears fruit. Let obstacles come in our way, but the day will come when, if temperance friends will speak, million-voiced and trumpet-tongued, parliament will hear; for God will make it hear, and a nation's curse will be obliterated forever."

OUR LIEGE LADY.

BY MRS. GEORGIA HULSE MCLEOD.

In that fair room, her work shop,
Are carved rare thoughts of gold,
And as she wills she sends them,
Glad story to be told.
The south land and the north land,
The east and the far west
Hear how she gathers round her
Mem'ries she loves the best.

Sometimes she has sad visions
Of fair young hopes that die,
Lives that by sin were blighted,
Homes that in ruins lie.
The Rum Fiend's track she noteth,
Each footprint leaves a grave,
And her heart aches with longing
The dying souls to save.

So, she praying, plans a rescue,
Rallies her loyal band,
The pure white ribbon army,
For God and native land.
Their march from Maine to Texas
Is heralded with songs,
From east to west the clan-call
To every home belongs.

Sad souls their hands have rescued
And lifted the bowed head,
In His name raised their banners
Who brought to life the dead.
His cross their strength and glory,
The promise fast they hold,
While mem'ries of Hillsboro
The weakest can make bold.

Our lady questions softly,
"North land, what of the night?"
The east sends back for answer,
"The day is growing bright?"
"Is it well, fair south land?"
Then swift on fragrant breath,
"'Tis well," the south makes answer,
"Christ has redeemed from death!"

"Praise God!" says loving Frances,
"Yet there are more to save.
Work!" is the word she speedeth
From rolling wave to wave.
"Work, for the homes, beloved,
For the land we hold so dear,
Until Rum's last, last victim
Shall shed shame's last sad tear."

Thus works, plans, prays Our Lady,
Worketh, yet not alone,
She sways a hundred thousand;
In true hearts is her throne.

THE CHURCH AND PROHIBITION.

BY MRS. EDNA GILMORE.

"What is the church? A body of men, women and children earnestly and faithfully working that Christly principles may be known and practiced by all men. What is its duty? Clearly, to encourage all that is pure, lovely and of good report—to frown upon and reject aught in politics, society or religions, not in strict conformity with the laws of the Christian faith." It has outlived the empire which frowned upon its birth; it has dealt unsparingly with the great moral questions of the past; it was strong enough for the man stealer and man seller, and it is strong enough for the liquor dealer and his adherents; it is mighty enough to crush the rum power in America, if deep down in hearts where Immanual reigns there be a full realization of that terrible statute of Christ, "No drunkard shall inherit the kingdom of heaven." Before this church, the greatest reformatory agency of the world, comes the question which is agitating every city, village and hamlet in the land, and is planting a germ of unrest in all politics.

Statistics are not needed to prove that nearly all the crime, shame and disgrace, sin and misery in this country, are caused by intemperance. A thoughtful Christian heart cannot look upon the unparalleled outrages of past years, fed and fostered by drunkenness, without an involuntary cry to heaven "Avenge oh Lord, thy slaughtered saints" whose bones lie in graves dug by drunken, murderous hands, and the equally anguished appeal, "What can I do, to stay this increasing tide of crime and terror?" Nor need we dilate upon the fact that the moral forces of this and other countries, are quietly but effectively at work to suppress this giant evil.

Long years ago noble Maine stepped into the front rank of the battle, and her earliest apostle of reform still lives, ruddy and cheerful, in his eightieth year, looking with grateful eyes upon the realization of his brightest dreams.

Not long ago, an eastern legislature put itself on record as unanimously in favor of prohibition. But, as "westward the star of empire takes its way," so, here in the west have been fought the minority battles for humanity which have made prohibition a possibility. Stately Iowa calls through her legislature a special election to decide this question, and Kansas, the brave, the true, has stepped proudly to the side of her elder sister Maine, in the enforcement of prohibitory laws.

Seventeen states have brought prohibition before their legislatures; three others have submitted it to a popular vote. Three states have made scientific temperance instruction obligatory in the public schools. Illinois and Nebraska losing the bill in the house though passed by the senate. In the national capital, amid all the corruptions of the day, and the strong pressure of the whisky interest, a few of nature's noblemen are holding up the banner of reform, and Mrs. Carlisle the leading lady of the land, gives heart and soul and voice to the work.

Fifty years ago a man stood before a critical Boston audience, with a new gospel on his lips and in his heart, and was received with infinite scorn and contempt. His known purity of motive, his culture, his aristocratic birth, availed him nothing against the insults of the mob. He was jeered at, hissed and hooted from the platform—his very life was in danger, but he stood calm and fearless before his enemies, conscious only of the duty before him. Not many weeks ago, he was laid to his rest and the laural and the cypress were woven together over his tomb; gifted pens immortalized his name; choral choirs sang his praises and the tears of an emancipated race dropped upon his grave.

So much for the growth in grace of the national heart! These men, in power, now the martyrs for opinion's sake, will one day be the heroes of the new temperance dispensation, and all will vie to do them the honor they deserve. In all departments of business, the law of total abstinence is gaining ground. At last, the world's interests are to be safe in the hands of sober men, and precious human life may no longer be held at the drunkard's pleasure.

Temperance organizations are springing up in city and country; Bands of Hope are enlisting the heart of childhood; young people are pausing to consider, and take up the burden of work for temperance. Moral suasion is holding out a generous hand to save a fallen brother, and all good impulses are crystallizing into the one grand resolve "Prohibition for the state and for the nation!" What shall we say of high license?—the last effort to temporize, to delay this hoped for result, but that it is an argument from the bottomless pit, sugar coated, that church members may swallow it easily?—a device of Satan to hold you, brethren of the churches, back from your duty—from the guerdon of success which awaits you? All honor to every good and honest agency for the reformation of men, but let there be no trifling! Here, as in religion, there is no middle ground upon which a Christian may safely stand, and while in our hearts we honor the least attempt to do good, we know that the foundation of moral principle must first be laid else the structure will fall. This question comes home to you, who professing to love Christ, must also keep His commandments, or ye are none of His. You cannot conscientiously serve Him who has pronounced a dreadful woe upon the man who puts the bottle to his neighbor's lips, if by your vote you protect or encourage the sale of liquor, with or without restrictions. This loathsome traffic, legalized and made respectable by government favor; drawing for government use, from the tithes of every still, the money which is wrung from the needs of the weak and helpless; which is brutalizing, either directly or indirectly every family in the nation, is to be suppressed, not by an appeal for governmental aid, but by reaching the sovereign people back of the government—the voters of the precinct—the families of the voters—yea, farther back, the individual heart where Christ reigns and rules. From you, then, must come the remedy if it comes at all. The leaven is working in the mass of meal, but the shapely hand of the church must mould and fashion, if the result is to be permanent, durable, perfect. All reformatory agencies have at heart the needs of the people, but it remains for the church to teach in its fullest meaning, the universal brotherhood of man. It is for the Christian to realize most keenly that he is his brother's keeper; moulding consciously or unconsciously his destiny; that what is injury to one, is injury to all for whom Christ died. Woe unto him who knows his duty and does it not. Oh! that from the pulpits of the land many a Gideon may rise, to wield the sword of the Lord which shall deliver our Israel from her bondage to selfish ambitions and private interests! Oh! that from the pews legions of soldiers may pass in review before their Christian commander, saying, "Here am I; send me to fight thy battles and the battles of humanity!" Even the philosophy of the times points to a sure retribution if duty be not done. If Carlyle, the acid, rejecting a revelation yet acknowledging one supreme power to govern and direct, could see, in the horrors of the French revolution, nothing but the simplest justice in return for the years of iniquity in a godless and careless nation, what would his prophetic eye see for us in the future, but "the sure compensation which underlies all facts" if we, believing in God who has said "Vengeance is mine and I will repay," still go on, opposing only a passive resistance to an evil we might sweep from existence?

Nor is it only your votes for prohibition that we of the W. C. T. U. ask at your hands. It is that you consider well and wisely the law of the land. "Let the majority rule"—and apply it to the settlement of this question. For the first time in history it is the majority who is oppressed—and that majority the purest, the best, the noblest among you. In the language of one venerated and loved by our union, "Prohibition will never be the law of the land until you, brethren, who put us in prison, let us out again." In the sixty thousand churches of America and its eight million members it is the grand "two-thirds" for whom we would plead before your manly bar. Into this discussion of the great question before the church comes, in the lull of debate, the voice of the sisterhood, but its olden murmer is deepening into a cry for deliverance which will be heard by the Father of justice and right.

There is no need of a third party to express at the polls the judgment of prohibition people. The women of the church are natural prohibitionists. Put the ballot at their disposal and with one wave of little hands, one flutter of white birds into the ballot box, the consummation is wrought, and a nation stands delivered, not by man's might, but by one stroke from the hand of a Jael upon the head of a Sisera. The only real hope of the drunkard is in a genuine conversion. Religion, aided by law, cannot only reform him who is deep in degradation, but can forever forbid drunkenness by putting temptation out of the way.

Why not, then, sanction by Christian votes the use of the womanly franchise? To "keep yourselves unspotted from the world is not merely to deny ourselves, and to vote for principle's sake, but to legislate that others whose motives are equally as pure, may do so also. To cling too closely to the traditions of the past is weakness. The millennium will never be reached by a severely true reproduction of what has been. There is, there must be, advance in all lines of thought and action, if we would keep pace with the responsibilities which are crowding upon heart and mind and soul.

No longer are women of the Dora Copperfield type wanted as wives, sisters, mothers, daughters. We must be willing not only to hold our husband's pens while he writes for God and His cause, but able also to wield them ourselves, if necessary. Nor is the stroke a very feeble one when it comes!

"The women don't know enough to vote." This protest of ignorance against the intelligence which can own, control, and invest capital with as much judgment as men use, is so nearly worn out as to need no refutation. "Women cannot vote" "because they are not capable of bearing arms," is another well nigh forgotten plea. Oh! brethren, if the administration of affairs by you in the past, so full of corruption, of moral and political transgression, be an example of the military form of government, ring in, we pray you, for humanity's sake, through gentle woman's rule, the era of the pacific arts, the day of "peace on earth, good will to men."

The tenderest, most watchful care, unselfish ministry and untiring industry have marked woman's church life, and here, in her chosen field she works not only well but successfully. So well is this appreciated by the brethren that in deference to the tireless ambition to be and to do the best that God requires, they have laid nearly all the church work upon shoulders which are, alas! too slender to bear any political burdens.

It is universally urged that the greatest barrier to woman's political preferment lies in the duties of motherhood, and did the two duties to God and the family, conflict, there would be force in the objection. But where in the world are happier homes to be found than in our mother country England? Yet, there and in Canada, women take part in local politics, and no one points out ruined homes because of the exercise of the franchise.

To conduct well and control wisely, a home and family, is to exhibit the diplomatic talent of a Tallyrand, the statesmanship of a Gladstone, the patience of a Job, the tenderness of a St. Ceciiia. These qualities may not be wanted in a general political way, but surely they are needed in the settlement of this great question of the day which comes home to none as to the hearts of the mothers in Israel, the women of the church. These qualities have inspired and led the work of our own W. C. T. U. They have carried its white banner to the outskirts of civilization; they have planted its auxiliaries in the cities, towns and villages of every state and territory and have snatched a temperance victory from the very jaws of every defeat. Our membership numbers one hundred thousand cultured Christian women; our leaders wear the double crown of gifts and grace. Our object is, not that restrictions may be laid upon the sale of liquor, not that minors may be protected from its use, not that added duty may be placed upon its importation, not that the number of sellers be reduced, but that once and forever its manufacture, sale, importation or exportation may be forbidden. That under no circumstances, in no time nor place may it be bought nor sold, by the gallon nor by the drop. Nay, more, we would lead the repentant son back to his father's house. We would place the the saloon keeper in a legitimate business, giving back his influence in the community, and to his humiliated family their true position in society.

It is not pride nor love of notoriety, nor self-seeking that has sent our anointed forth to their work. It is the clarion call of duty which summons them to the defense of all that is dear, and their panoply of war is the one weapon, the sword of the Spirit.

God has planted deep in woman's soul this great love of home, husband, and children, and when danger threatens them her every instinct is on the alert, her whole being is stirred to its inmost depths, and life itself is not counted too great a sacrifice to save them. Men of the church, the prayers of those you love are going every day and hour to the All-wise Father that he will help you to be brave, and wise, and right. The faith of the Christian women of the land tells them that prohibition is coming. The seed has been sown with many bitter tears and broken hearts of women, and now they believe the fulness of time is near. The W. C. T. U. has lifted the curtain and they are ready to share the victory with you when you shall clear the way. Happy she, who, while keeping heart and home warm, may also

"Keep step with the manhood that marches the zone,
And believe that our God will take care of His own."

MRS. HULDAH ANN'S VICTORY.

BY MARY E. C. WYETH.

"There you needn't say any more, Huldy Ann, I shan't go a step. You may take part and lot in such goings on, if you've a mind to. I ain't accountable for you. But there's too many points of difference twixt them and me, for me to pretend to any sort of fellowshipping with them."

"Not even so much as to go up to the meeting tonight in the hope of saying a helpful word to poor Dorris Tomkins, who's been steady in attendance ever since the Campsburg preacher came over that day and showed him such kindness? I sh'd think you'd go as far as that, Kizzy."

Miss Kizzy Simson colored. Huldy Ann's placid face and beseeching tones "riled" her, as she afterwards confessed. She answered a bit sharply.

"P'r'aps you should. Folks don't always think alike, as you've had reason to know. Dorris Tomkins knows main well the difference between right and wrong. If he's seeking salvation, let him seek it in the reg'lar way. These new fangled fashions aren't according to Scripture, and I don't give 'em my countenance."

The sunny living room was all aglow with the rays of a glorious October sunset, and the shining andirons on the hearth, and the old clock above the mantel caught and reflected the golden gleamings, adding a charm to the pleasant scene.

Huldy Ann, a gentle, simple hearted woman, past the prime of life, sat by the window, looking toward the west, where the heavens were telling the glory of God in beautiful sublimity. The bit of mending upon which she had been industriously occupied had fallen from her hands, as she had persuasively reasoned with her sister on a subject concerning which they had for the past month frequently spoken together, but always with differing views. A new sect of professing disciples of Christ had sent an embassy to the town where these sisters dwelt, and had begun and carried on a gospel mission among the inhabitants. They had set up a tent on the common, where preaching and prayer went on all day and every evening.

Members of the society visited the townspeople at their homes and in their place of business, and made known to them their business. They held views not altogether in accord with the orthodox standard prevailing in the town—but they preached a pure gospel of repentance and faith in Christ, and the blessing of God had seemed to crown their daily labors.

Under their preaching some conversions had occurred. One dramseller had turned from his ways, given up his traffic in liquor, signed the pledge, and humbled himself to learn of the way of life. No harm had come from the visit of the Gospel Mission—and certain good had been wrought. Many of the members of the churches in the town had attended the meetings, and some had taken part in the exercises. Others stood aloof and frowned or criticized. Among the latter Miss Kizzy Simson, a strong, earnest, zealous member of the oldest and strictest sect in her place, a power in her own church and society, and a valuable helper in almost every good work. Also a great stickler for the regular order.

"Strait is the gate, and narrow is the way," she had said to Huldy Ann only that very afternoon, when opposing her sister's wish to draw her into co-operative work with the Mission Christians. "I know it, Kizzy"—Mrs. Huldah Ann assented—"but you've no call to make it straiter and narrower than it is—have you? Don't you remember how Peter warned that sect of Pharisees which believed, not to put a yoke on the necks of the disciples? Seems to me, the main thing is to have folks come to Christ, whether the gospel call that reaches them comes to them through the pulpit or the prayer meeting of the house of worship, or by the voice of one crying in the wilderness."

And Miss Kizzy had made answer that she hadn't "no leaning toward looseness or irregularity in any thing, especially in religion." She wanted "every thing done decently and in order."

Now as Mrs. Huldy Ann sat silent, looking off at the sunset skies, Miss Kizzy stepped briskly about the room "putting to rights" as she explained it, things that had never gone wrong, and tidying up the fleckless and flawless furnishings of the cheery apartment, preparatory to laying the cloth for the early tea. Her last words, in answer to her sister's plea for her word with Dorris Tomkins had been a decided one. She shouldn't countenance the Gospel Mission. It was true to her lifelong convictions and habit. There were ways and ways indeed, but Miss Kizzy had never recognized but one way as the right way to effect any accomplishment. She did not now. She was but loyal to herself in this latest expression of herself. Yet strangely enough she was not satisfied with herself. She was well versed in the scriptures, and Mrs. Huldy Ann's allusion to the sect of the Pharisees and St. Peter's warning brought the whole context to her mind, "Now, therefore, why tempt ye God?" Was she tempting God by acting against the manifestation of his will? One and another had been converted. She had been forced to acknowledge the fact. These, her neighbors, had had their hearts purified by faith. God's Spirit had been among these workers as witness of God's approval. What was she doing in holding aloof thus stoutly?

When the tea was over and the evening lamp was lit, as Mrs. Huldy Ann rose to prepare to go as her custom was to the meeting in the gospel tent, Miss Kizzy said in a mild voice, "You ain't offended with me Huldy Ann, are you for speaking so positive?"

"I should hope not, Kizzy," answered Mrs. Huldy Ann gently. "As you say, folks can't always think alike, and when folks are good and honest and true, there ought to be no hard feelings on account of differences. God, who knows the hearts judges us all rightly, and as to these Gospel Mission folks, they may be nearer right than we, or we than they, I don't pretend to say. But we believe that through the grace of the Lord Jesus Christ we shall be saved even as they. Don't we?

And that sweet word gained Mrs. Huldy Ann the victory—for Miss Kizzy deliberately rolled up her knitting work, that she had begun for her evening stent, and answered decidedly, after her usual manner, "I've changed my mind, Huldy Ann; I'll go with you and do my part."

SHORT TEMPERANCE TALKS.

BY MISS C. S. BURNETT.

No. 5.—Why we Talk.

Because we have something to say which we think people ought to hear. Because not to talk is a sin when silence implies indifference or acquiescence in wrong.

Mothers talk because their hearts are breaking with grief for ruined sons and blasted hopes. God only knows the heartache and tears, the long, weary hours of watching that bring to the home from which happiness has almost fled, the bloated, it may be insensible, form of what was once the fond mother's pride. O, it is sad to be a drunkard's child, a drunkard's wife, but saddest of all to be a drunkard's mother!

Our wives talk because they have been robbed of the sweet boon of love, of sheltering tenderness and dear protection by this demon Rum. O how many have seen the beautiful home where love sat queen exchanged for the vile tenement house where terror of the natural protector reigns.

Many thousands talk because they see their husbands day by day led on and on by that fatal delusion "It does not hurt me, I can stop when I wish." Well do our women know they will not stop; the cords are drawn tighter and tighter; the drunkard's doom and the drunkard's hell await them. O wives, talk on, but talk to the point. Demand the utter extermination of all that can intoxicate.

Our young women talk because they see the young men with whom they associate becoming more and more unworthy of their love. They want the temptation removed from those who are too weak to resist but who otherwise would be "nature's true noblemen." Our ministers see three-fourths of the Christian church are women and very many of the other fourth are rendered powerless for good by the habit of tippling, so they talk or ought to do so.

The Sabbath school worker finds the boys gradually drifting from the school to the saloon, so he talks and ought to do still more.

Our statesmen are beginning to talk for they can see no bright future before a country controlled by votes bought with whisky. Not till temperance reigns at our state and national capitals can we hope for the highest good to our own proud country.

The tax payer grumbles because taxes are so high. Honest, industrious people are getting tired of supporting paupers and paying the cost of criminal courts. Talk on, brothers, talk on.

So we all talk. God help us to talk wisely and show our faith by our works as well!

A few years ago this nation talked up a war that cost us billions in money and millions in lives. Let us hope that this new war against King Alcohol can be ended by ballots and not by blood. Dear workers, let us talk "for God and home and native land," but let us talk and act in the fear of the Lord.

HOW A BOY WAS SAVED.

BY JANE EGGLESTON ZIMMERMAN.

The subject of the proper disposal of the boys of this generation is justly attracting wide attention of late. As wealth increases, the proportion of boys without anything to do out of school hours, increases likewise. A recent writer, following the lead of Mr. Washington Gladden, who has given to parents an earnest awakening on this subject, imagines a father sighing over his eighteen year old son, and saying, "It is too late for me now. My boy is eighteen years old and as large as a man, and his life is utterly aimless yet."

This recalls to my mind a case in point, which, having the merit of being strictly true may prove of interest to such fathers.

A gentleman in Virginia some sixty or seventy years ago, had a son eighteen years of age, who, he suddenly discovered, was becoming dissipated, "going to the bad," as it is often aptly termed. He could not believe it at first, the boy had seemed to be all right and he had never allowed liquor to be used at home, although its use in that country and at that day was well nigh universal. He determined to watch for himself and see if this boy, his eldest son, the pride of his heart, were really what he had heard, a wild, dissipated young man.

On the next occasion of his son's leaving home, the father shortly after his departure, mounted his horse and rode in the same direction. He followed him to the house of a cousin several miles distant where he found his son in company with this cousin, himself one of the most reckless young men of the neighborhood, together with several others of like character and habits.

When this father entered the room where the young men were, he found them gambling and drinking, his son, apparently, as bad as the rest. This father believed in the scripture "Train up a child"—up, till he is a man, not half way, merely. He therefore ordered his son to return with him. The boy did not dare to refuse. His father, after talking long and seriously with him, then forbade his leaving the plantation for a year and a half, at the same time giving him entire charge of its affairs.

This command was strictly enforced; the young man was kept at home and at work instead of being sent to college, as his father had earnestly hoped. The result was, the boy, at the end of the time was a man with business habits, and with no relish for his old ways or the society of his former companions. He lived a long and honored life, being for twenty years or more, a magistrate of the county, and a ruling elder in the Presbyterian church, while his cousin, the only one of his companions with whose history I am acquainted, died in a few years a miserable wreck.

Parental authority is consistent with the tenderest love, and should never be surrendered till the child is fully grown and settled in the things that make for his peace. It requires thought and care and trouble taking to secure it, but it does not cause half the trouble and care that the opposite course causes. Long ago, it was said, "A child left to himself bringeth his mother to shame."

"Some people," says Alphonse Karr, "are always finding fault with nature for putting thorns on roses. I always thank her for putting roses on thorns."

A RETROSPECT OF THE WASHINGTON CONVENTION.

Dear Union Signal.—To the noble army of women enlisted under the white banner of the W. C. T. U., the rapid development of women in patriotic, philanthropic, scientific and moral service is inspiring and amazing.

Attend a great temperance convention, listen to the powerful and eloquent speeches and appeals from women of every state in the Union, and who can doubt, who for one moment fail to recognize the Divine commission thrilling through their truly inspired voices? You know these women eloquent—their names are household words with the W. C. T. U., and we need not re-write them here—now with a true prayer of gratitude in your hearts for these leaders, come with me to another national gathering of women, the annual meeting of the National Woman's Suffrage association; see the immense audiences continuing to grow larger and larger, through the four days' sessions; listen to every word uttered from the soul lifting, consecrating prayer of Rev. Florence Kollock, until the close of Susan B. Anthony's speech; read the declaration of principles, the letters more than five hundred in number from representative men and women of Europe and America; hear our women under the very dome of the capitol, before senators and members plead for justice, and demand that the hand that rocks the cradle shall help to rule the world; listen to the pleas for suffering womanhood, for wronged manhood, for outraged childhood, and tell me if you do not recognize in this gentle but fearless brigade another wing of the grand army who in the near future age, sister women, who at this very hour constitute the balance of power in this government.

Who are the leaders of this advance guard? First the beloved president, Mrs. Elizabeth Cady Stanton, who when on April 20th, 1852, nearly a third of a century ago, upon being elected president of the New York State Temperance convention, to an audience of three thousand, voiced these words, "If a sincere love for the principles of temperance, a fervent zeal in the welfare of women, and an unswerving faith in the final triumph of truth, fits one for this post of honor, then I am not unworthy, though I must confess myself from the novelty of my position, ignorant alike of the rights and duties of the office of president, and how my heart throbs to see women assembling in convention to inquire what part they have in the great moral struggles of humanity. Verily a new era is dawning upon the world. We have come together at this time to consult in regard to what women may do in banishing the vice of intemperance from the land. We can do much by years of preparation and education of ourselves, for a great moral revolution will burst forth with the regeneration of women."

Presiding over this National Woman Suffrage convention today (in the absence of Mrs. Stanton), is Susan B. Anthony, who in 1853 having canvassed every county in the great state of New York in the interests of temperance, presided over a temperance convention, one committee of which presented a petition for a prohibitory liquor law signed by 28,000 women.

"In such a forge and such a heat" was developed the clearer vision in regard to the relation of the ballot to all moral reform, and under these noble leaders, there assembled in Washington representative women from twenty-six states and territories, assembled with such true consecration, such unswerving faith in truth and right, such an abiding belief in Divine leadership, that even the president of the United States after the reception which he himself tendered to the delegates, said privately to a friend, "that all his prejudices had been wonderfully weakened, as he had never looked into the faces of so noble a delegation of women."

Among these delegates were, Susan B. Anthony, Rev. Phoebe Hannaford, Dr. Clemence Lozier, Mrs. Jessie Wellstood, of Scotland; Mrs. Martha McClellan Brown, of Ohio; Mrs. Mary B. Clay, of Ky.; Phoebe W. Couzins, Missouri; Mrs. Abigail Scott Dunnaway, of Oregon; Mrs. Caroline H. Miller, of Maryland; Harriet R. Shattuck, Mass.; Mrs. May Wright Sewell, Mrs. Helen M. Gougar and Mrs. Mary E. Haggart, of Indiana; Mrs. Lillain Devereaux Blake, Mrs. Caroline Gilky Rogers and Mrs. Mary Seymour Howell, of New York; Mrs. Bertha Ellsworth, of Kansas; Rev. Florence Kollock, Mrs. Hannah Coffee, etc., of Illinois.

We had thought to write of the marked social recognition of the delegates, of the elegant reception tendered by Mr. and Mrs. Spafford at the Riggs House, of the reception tendered by the president at the White House, of the there "hearings" before congressional committees, but we must close by referring to the platform of principles adopted and the plan of work indicated from which I glean the following striking utterances:

We believe that only by universal suffrage can the liberties and interests of all classes be secured and a true republic be maintained.

We believe that compulsory education and universal suffrage should go hand in hand, that all people may be qualified to vote intelligently.

We believe that in a republic the exercise of suffrage is a duty that no patriotic citizen may ignore.

And whereas, the fundamental idea of a republic is the right of self-government, the right of every citizen to choose her own representatives to enact the laws by which she is governed;

And whereas, this right can be secured only by the exercise of the suffrage; therefore

Resolved, That the ballot in the hand of every qualified citizen constitutes the true political status of the people, and to deprive one-half of the people of the use of the ballot is to deny the first principles of a republican government.

That the woman question is forever the human question, and that the best service we can render man is to work for the elevation of his mother.

That the question of the hour for women patriots is not "all the rights I want," but all the rights I am entitled to and can use.

Mrs. Gougar, chairman of the committee on plan of work, reported the following resolutions, which were adopted as read, the entire audience voting:

Resolved, That we hold a convention in every unorganized state and territory in the Union during the present year, these conventions to be held so far as possible at the capital of the state or territory.

Resolved, That we consider the enfranchisement of the women citizens of the United States the paramount issue of the hour; therefore

Resolved, That we will by all honorable methods oppose the election of any presidential candidate who is a known opponent to woman suffrage, and we recommend similar action on the part of our state associations in regard to state and congressional candidates; and further

Resolved, That the officers of this convention shall communicate with the presidential nominees of the several political parties and ascertain their positions upon this question.

Elizabeth Boynton Harbert.

A SOUTHERN VIEW OF CINCINNATI RIOTS.

Dear Union Signal:—Your pertinent questions in regard to the Cincinnati riot might have gone still farther into the original causes and found that it was "whisky and beer" that first filled the jails with the criminals against whom the rioters were so incensed, and that it was whisky and beer that prevented the claimed for administration of the law.

The black trail of the liquor traffic can be plainly traced through it all, drunkenness, crime, injustice, rioting, lawlessness, drunkenness and crime again.

Can anything be plainer? I cannot believe but that God permitted the sore evil, made more deplorable by the suffering and death of the innocent, as a chastisement, and to awaken our land to a sense of its degradation and wrong doing, and to arouse them to a faithful discharge of duty. And if the warning be not heeded, other and more terrible evils may be sent upon us.

Let us hope and pray that the warfare against intemperance and the liquor traffic may be a bloodless one. But as the land incessantly "cries out for the blood" of thousands and thousands of thousands who have fallen before it, nothing short of the atoning blood of the Son of God Himself, can wipe out the black stains which otherwise must remain there and continue to cry out for vengeance.

If the rioters were maddened in their reckless attempt to enforce the law, there was a strong under current of "method in their madness," looking to the righting of grievous wrongs, which those in authority had failed to execute. And the country though condemning the manner of procedure, has approved of the spirit of reform, and is looking for great good to result.

We have good cause in Georgia to be thankful for our onward progress in the right direction. Nearly one hundred counties for prohibition, and others working for it. Our state Sunday school convention at Columbus, next week, devotes a special session to "temperance," and Mrs. Chapin is invited to address them.

We have had a season of temperance work here in Augusta this winter, with our convention, and several addresses from Mrs. Chapin and Mrs. Hannah W. Smith, and Mrs. M. L. Dickinson, all to help and encourage us. The beautiful soul-comforting lectures of Mrs. Smith are never to be forgotten, and doing good for a life time. Our union has had a number of additions, and we have been more actively engaged than ever before. A union has been formed among the colored people and I hope a good work begun in that direction. Several most interesting and enthusiastic meetings have been held in the neighborhood of several of our largest factories and the union and Band of Hope organized among them a year ago is increased in membership.

The Rev. M. H. Dillard of the Methodist church in the settlement and a most enthusiastic and earnest temperance worker has been the means, with God's blessing, of helping to close a number of saloons and to reform many drunkards. These bar-rooms had sprung up like mushrooms near the factories, to sap away the hard earned wages of the working people, and though several still remain, another will soon close and a growing temperance sentiment will, we trust with God's blessing, eventually remove them all.

Another gain in temperance work is that Mrs. Mary M. Hunt's book looking to scientific instruction for schools will be introduced into our largest academy for boys, (military.) And I hope also to have it in other schools.

Mrs. Chapin has been doing most effective work in other states as well as her own during the winter. She is a marvel of energy, strength and endurance. She is now going "the rounds" of her own state again, and from the enthusiasm with which she is received it is hoped that South Carolina will soon be free!

The temperance question is being agitated in every direction, and the glorious dawn of a brighter day looms up in the distance. Let us hope that it brings the promise of redemption for a perishing world.

Mrs. W. C. Sibley, State Pres. Georgia.

A NEW DEGREE.

Dear Union Signal:—Having accepted the superintendency of the "Foreign" department, which should have after it D. D., (difficult and destitute,) I find myself constantly casting about, amid much prayer and supplication, for means whereby to carry on the immense work that needs to be done. It is like a great roystering baby, brought as a waif into a household already full of children, "to the manner born"—nobody has time, or food, or clothes to give it. But it is there. It won't hush and its screams must be stopped in mere self defense if for no better reason. There is another cause however which comes to the wise, tired, little mother with persistent force. This great strong baby will be a young giant soon, able and willing to give a vast deal of trouble if we do not train him aright. We must teach and instruct and put good principles into him, or he will spoil all we are doing for the rest of the boys. So, weary and tired and poor as we are, we might just as well go to work for Fritz, for he is here and won't "down."

This conflict into which women have been thrown for the last few years, reminds me constantly of the war—I say "the war" for to most of us there has been but one war. An officer high in position, told me that he had been placed where he became cognizant of the fact that the women of the north raised fifty two millions of money for the needed supplies during that dark period, without which it would have been impossible to carry on the work.

We are in the midst of a conflict far worse than that was. More deadly, more deleterious is its effects. Why can we not raise money as we did then. The only reason is that women as a class, have not yet become stimulated up to their duty. A few work just as hard and incessantly as they did at that time, but the large majority are apathetic.

I do not believe that the men are in the right position either—I mean the temperance men—Christian men. They do not feel enough responsibility. It is rather nice to have their wives engaged and interested in moral questions. It keeps up the standard of the family in benevolence, and they are rather willing that their wives should spend some of their "pin money" in this way too. Of course it's "all right," "women are never happy unless they're doing something of that kind; keeps 'em out of mischief."

And so the patronizing paterfamilias lights his cigar and proceeds to his morning paper, never realizing how his wife's heart aches that she must be content with two dollars where she wanted to give twenty. "Oh! why can't we give it out and out? Why must the work drag along for five years, that might be done in one, if we only had the money?" I like the idea of a fund from the precious things. I wish we could get it up for the convention next fall. I know a number of women who are hunting among their treasures to lay aside something they love. Mrs. Hazard has a valuable old coin she will send, date about 1600 and something. Another has an oil painting, recently painted in Europe, by a lady, which will cost about forty dollars when framed, which is laid aside for the fund. I do not know to what this money will be appropriated, but I know we must have money for German literature some way. I am constantly buoyed up with the knowledge that "the silver and the gold are the Lord's," and that this is His work, and therefore we shall have it in time. But I do wish those who have it borrowed would pay up promptly.

NORTHERN WORKERS IN TEXAS.

Dear Union Signal:—We who live in this extreme southwest portion of the sisterhood of states, are feeling the blessed influences of gospel temperance coming to us with a divine power, sweeping like an avalanche through all our country and the world.

What a blessed recognition of woman's work that the C was put in its proper place, qualifiying the nature of work done by the W. C. T. U. We are cautious, sincere, Christian women in this south land and must be convinced Thus saith the Lord, before we take a step forward.

We who know the spirit and work The Union Signal represents, and of the life of its co-workers, are sure they are under the shelter of the Christian church. It will be said of scores of them, by their pastors, as of our beloved friend, Mrs. Wait, of Galesburg, Ill., one of the very first in your organization: "You, her sisters of the W. C. T. U., are surely not as greatly bereft as I, her pastor. I am the one who have cause to mourn the loss of such a tried and faithful member of my church. What shall I do without her help in this congregation?"

Now, dear Union Signal, spread abroad this fact among all the churches, that the daughters of Zion are being called forth by their King. Tell them all, great are the company of those that publish gospel temperance. The Lord gave the word. Let the ministers and people no longer fear to trust the women, when their King leadeth, though heretofore she may have lien among the pots, for now He may cover her wings as of a dove with silver, and feathers as with yellow gold.

Think of these two blessed women, Mrs. Henry R. Smith and Mrs. Dr. Joshua Smith, coming down to this sunny clime to recruit their exhausted strength and heal lungs that threatened to cease their life-giving office, having given their very best life to the work of the W. C. T. U. of Chicago, rallying as they have done, and at once lending their long experience and inspiration to arouse the sleeping zeal and energies of the W. C. T. U. of the San Antonio organization called into existence by the beloved National president. In one week Mrs. H. R. S. spoke to three adult audiences and three of children, visiting the government post and being received most cordially by General V. and wife, who are stationed there, and receiving permission to have a room where weekly meetings can be held for the soldiers' benefit, and where the different ministers may address them on temperance work.

In this too long letter I have no room to hint even of the faithful work done among the children in kindergarten, Bands of Hope, both black and white, having the hearty co-operation of nearly all the pastors, by dear Mrs. Dr. J. Smith. You will never hear of all the details until the King of Zion rewards His faithful servants.

TREASURE TROVE.

Dear Union Signal.—Another one! This blessed wonderful Woman's Christian Temperance Union that has so developed the energy and perseverance and tact of the thousands of our women throughout the country, is not only leavening California by its gospel power, but it is bringing out, where their influence is so greatly needed, such gracious, capable and Christian women.

Such a one I have had the pleasure of finding in the president of Butte, Tehama and Shasta counties. This lady, the wife of General John Bidwell, of Chico, and the president of the Chico W. C. T. U., is another of this glorious sisterhood of which I find myself each year growing more gratefully, joyously proud.

With an elegant home, a very queen in the honor and homage accorded her by her noble husband, her life is one earnest, active round of benevolence. Not only does she find time to carry on efficiently, and with very blessed results, on the town, the work of the local union, along the lines of instruction and prevention, but she is now directing the plans for the opening of a temperance coffee house—could go to Red Bluff, Hadly and Biggs—and by her presence and interest give inspiration to the work of speaking and organizing. Takes the superintending as president of three counties—supplying them with literature; visiting and instructing them—and at the same time, one of the most indefatigable church workers in the Presbyterian church of Chico, in home and foreign mission work and in all helpful social and literary enterprises.

Add to this that she has a school of Indians, which she teaches in a little chapel built for this purpose by the General, that for eight years she has spent four hours daily in instructing these men, women and children, and on Sunday holds at the same house religious services with them, and I think I have given you the outline of the picture of "another of them."

The enterprises of General Bidwell in developing the resources of one of the the finest ranches in California, are all participated in by his wife. New roads, drains, avenues, orchards, fruit culture, commodious homes for the work people, tasty and well improved residences for the superintendents of the different departments of their extensive and magnificent ranch; the milling, the fruit drying, the canning, with everything she is identified in interest and sympathy; sharing the cares of her husband and entering into all his plans.

Add to this the most bountiful, elegant and courteous hospitality—presided over by a little lady crowned by all sweet and gentle womanliness—and do you wonder that I want to make glad the hearts of our dear women by telling them through our bright Union Signal that I have found another one? H. A. Hobart.

A NOTE FROM THE SOUTH.

Dear Union Signal:—I write you from the land of roses. But notwithstanding all its loveliness strong drink has fastened its venom on high and low. As the result of this curse four murders were committed in ten days, which aroused the nearly defunct W. C. T. U. A meeting was held in which all the ministers took part Seven members were added to the W. C.T.U. Thursday night a W. C. T. U. was organized in the colored M. E. church and fifty signed the pledge. An Industrial school was established. A Band of Hope was organized in the colored M. E. church with 150 members. The claims of The Union Signal were presented. The pastor of the colored church expressed his determination to have a copy in every family. Mrs. Dr. Joshua Smith has opened a kindergarten in San Antonio. Mrs. Fixen is to speak there the 14th and 15th. Mrs. Henry R. Smith.

"FROW IT DOWN."

BY FANNIE BOLTON.

A "Band of Hope" teacher has told me, dear children,
A sweet little story so full of good cheer
That I cannot refrain from just telling it over,
To help you to fight down old whisky and beer.

She went to the dear kindergarten one morning,
And a cute little fellow caught hold of her hand;
"I am one of your temperance scholars," he murmured,
"I's signed to the pledge and belong to the Band."

"You've signed to the pledge," said the teacher half smiling,
"And what does it mean to be signed there, my dear?"
"Oh it means I'm to drow up and vote prohibition,
And never touch whisky nor 'bacco nor beer."

"You told us that beer makes the start for a drunkard,
And my mamma had some on just t'other day."
The dear little features grew sadly o'erclouded,
"And tell me," said teacher, "then what did you say?"

"I said," lisped the sweet little lips, "Don't you touch it!"
His white rounded forehead grew stern with a frown,
And his voice grew as deep as childhood could make it,
"I said, Frow it down, mamma dear, frow it down!"

"And some how this incident cheered me and thrilled me,"
Said the Band of Hope teacher, "for oh! don't you see,
The Band of Hope children are going to save us,
And win in the future a grand victory?"

The sweet little voices now influence mothers,
And fathers will quail at the sight of the frown.
And won't the curse cease and saloons totter over
When our grand coming army shall shout "Throw them down?"

"YE HAVE DONE IT UNTO ME."

"Ye have done it unto Me, ye have done it unto Me," sung Jenny, one Monday morning. "There! I'll remember it this time, sure. But, dear me! I'm forgetting after all. The teacher said we must not only learn the words, but think of what they mean, and try to do them."

"Let me see, now," and she pressed her chubby hands to her forehead; "teacher said, 'If we gave a cup of cold water to one of His little ones, for the Savior's sake He would say, 'Ye have done it unto me.' I don't s'pose I know any of His little ones, but I'll try if I can find 'em."

She ran into the kitchen where on the dresser she spied a large bowl which was used to mix cake in.

"Ah!" thought she, "the Savior is pleased if we give His little ones a cupful of water; He'll like a bowlful better still. Bridget, may I take this bowl awhile?"

Bridget, who was busy with her washing, did not turn her head, but said,—

"Oh, yes; take what you like."

Jenny lifted the big bowl down very carefully; but how to fill it was the question. She did not want to trouble Bridget; besides, she had an idea that she ought to do it all herself.

A bright thought struck her; taking the cup that always hung on the pump, she filled it several times, and poured it into the bowl.

"It's cupsful, after all," she thought.

It was almost more than she could carry without spilling; but she walked slowly to the front gate. There was no one in sight, and Jenny set her burden on the grass and swung on the gate while she waited. Presently, along came two little girls on their way to school.

"Want a drink?" called Jenny.

"Yes, indeed; it's so hot, and I'm dreadful thirsty. I most always am. But how are we to get at it?" Laughing as she saw the great bowl.

"Oh, I'll soon fix that!" and Jenny ran for the tin cup with which they dipped out the water.

"It tastes real good," they said and kissed her as they ran off to school.

The next that appeared was a short, red-faced Irishman, wiping his face with the sleeve of his flannel shirt, while an ugly dog trotted at his side.

"He don't look much like 'one of the little ones,'" thought Jenny, doubtfully; but she timidly held out her cup. He eagerly drained it, filling it again, and drinking.

"And it must be a blessed angel ye are, for it's looking for a tavern I was, and now I won't nade to go nigh one at all. And shure, afther all, water's better nor whisky. Might I give some to the poor baste?" pointing to his dog.

Jenny hesitated; she did not like the idea of having the dog drink from her cup or bowl. But the man settled it by pouring the remnant of the water into his dirty old hat, the dog instantly lapping it up.

After they were gone, Jenny filled her bowl again. But I can't tell you now of all to whom she gave cups of cold water that hot day. But when she laid her tired head on the pillow that night, she thought,—

"I wonder whether, after all, any of 'em were His 'little ones?'"

And the dear Savior, looking down and seeing that the little girl had done all that she could for His sake, wrote after her day's work, "Ye have done it unto Me."

THE FALSE BALANCE

Two little girls, in the early morning of an October day, were dressing in a sleepy fashion, or rather one of them was dressing, and the other sat on the side of the bed looking at her.

"There," said Bess, impatiently, "now that mean old shoe string must go and break, and I know that bell's just going to ring. Turn over the leaf, Gussie, so we can be learning the text while we do our hair."

Gussie got up on the bed, and turned over the leaf on a roll of texts which hung on the wall, and then stood a minute, reading it to herself.

"Why don't you hurry?" said Bess, looking up at her, "you'll be awful late. My senses me! What a text to pick out for folks! 'A false balance is abomination unto the Lord.' 'Pears to me if I were a Sabbath school committee, or whoever does print out these verses, I'd find some that has some sense to 'em."

"Why, Bessie Maynard, that's in the Bible, and I sh'd think you wouldn't dare to talk so," said Gussie, with horrified eyes.

"Well, I don't mean just that way, of course. I mean sense for everybody. You know yourself there's a difference. There's verses about wives, and husbands, and ministers, and—and grandmothers, and they don't fit everybody. I should think that verse was meant for grocerymen that don't weigh things right, and I just wish they had to learn it."

"It's easy to learn, anyhow," said Gussie, "only I like to think about my verse. Some of them seem just a purpose for me, like 'diligent in business,' and 'whatsoever thy hand.'"

"Yes," said Bess, complacently, "you are so slow, Gussie, and such a put-off-er, but there isn't a thing in this verse to think about."

There was a little silence, for Bessie was brushing her thick, curly locks, and it took all her patience to struggle through the tangles.

"That's because you didn't brush it out last night," said Gussie.

"I s'pose so; but it is such a bother. Dear me! I'm just going to braid it this way; I can't stop."

"O Bessie! you know mamma won't like it; and it spoils your hair," said Gussie.

"It'll do for once," said Bess; "it looks all right, anyhow."

"I wonder," began Gussie, and then suddenly stopped.

"What?"—inquired Bess.

"I don't know—I thought maybe that might be what the text meant," said Gussie, slowly; "sort of half doing things; not quite giving so much as you pretend to"—

Gussie stopped, afraid of offending the sister of whose superior gifts she stood greatly in awe; but Bess only laughed as she answered, "You do think of the queerest things, Gussie."

That was what they all said of Gussie, but she kept on thinking.

It was her day to dust the parlor.

"I'll help you," said Bess; "and then you'll get through, so we can go for chestnuts."

"But you don't do the corners, Bessie, and you havn't moved any of the books," said Gussie, as she watched her sister's rapid whisks of the duster.

"What's the difference?" said Bess. "It looks all right; you s'pose anybody's going to peek around after a speck of dust? There, now, that's done."

But Gussie, with the thought of that false balance in her queer little head, kept on until the work was thoroughly done, saying to herself, "If I pretend to give mamma a pound of work, and only give her half a pound, I'm sure that's deceitful balance."

The next thing in order was to pick over the grapes for jelly, and even patient Gussie sighed over the big basket, but as usual, Bessie's part was completed long before hers.

"I wish you would learn to be a little more nimble with your fingers, Gussie," said her mother, and Bessie added, in an undertone, "It's 'cause you fuss so; s'posin' a bad grape does go in now and then, who's going to know it when they're all mashed up?"

"I don't care," said Gussie, feeling a little touched by her mother's criticism. "I sha'n't have any false balance 'bout my work, 'cause the Lord can tell a bad grape if it is mashed up; it's putting it in."

Only one thing more stood between the little girls and the holiday excursion for chestnuts. The history lesson must be learned for Monday, and then they would be as free as the birds. "How I hate it," said Gussie, "stupid, dry stuff about ad-min-is-ter-a-tions. I don't see any use in knowing it, anyhow."

"I'll tell you what," said Bess, "let's begin about the middle, because the first of it never does come to us."

"And then, said Gussie, "Miss Marcy will s'pose of course we know the beginning."

"Yes," nodded Bess, beginning to gabble over the words. "I'm going to finish in half an hour—'On account of these things it was plainly impossible'"—

"But we don't know what things," said Gussie.

"No, and I don't care."

"And if Miss Marcy s'poses we know and gives us a credit, it'll be a deceitful balance, 'cause we make her think we know a pound when we only know a half a pound."

Bessie's face flushed a little. "I just wish, Gussie Maynard, you wouldn't talk any more about that grocery man's text. It's just nonsense trying to make it fit us."

But after all Bessie did not feel quite comfortable, and she went back and learned the beginning of her lesson.

"There," she said, "that's good, full weight, and I don't intend to be a 'bomination any more."—Christian Observer.

A LETTR FROM THE GENERAL OF THE ARMY.

Dear Children of the J. T. U.—I have not forgotten my promise to write you another letter, and should have done so before, if I had not been so busy helping some of the dear friends form new Bands; for all over the country the cry is going up, "What can we do for the children?" How glad I am that this is so, for if all the dear boys and girls of today learn what awful things alcohol and tobacco are, and their evil effects upon the human system, think what a temperance army we will soon have to help along in this great war.

I am happy to know that so many of you read my last letter and were interested enough to answer it; I love the dear children and am always glad to hear from them. I think I promised to write you a story this time, telling how you may all help in this great and good work. Well, I will; and what is better, it is a true one!

I know a little girl about nine years old, who asked permission to hold a little temperance school in her own home, of children who did not attend the Band of Hope. About twelve joined, and met once a week in the nursery. This little girl was president, and others acted as secretary and treasurer. The president opened the meeting with a little prayer, telling the children they must be very quiet, for this was not play but earnest.

They called the roll, took up the collection, had a catechism lesson and a black board exercise, all the little president could remember from her own lesson of the week before. Each little girl pledged a penny a week, the treasurer to use the funds to buy badges, cards or anything needed, and they hope to increase their store by giving a little entertainment, consisting of songs, recitations etc., and invite their parents and friends. They, of course, all sign the pledge.

Now do you not think that is a good thing to do, to interest your little friends who do not attend a regular school?

Some people seem to think boys and girls are not good for much, but we remember the story of the stranded ship, to which the shore people managed to attach a rope, hoping to pull her off the rocks. The men pulled with all their might and finding they could do no good, they sent for the women of the village to assist, still the ship refused to more, then the children came along and cried out "Let us help!"

I suppose some gruff old sailor growled "What can children do?" but they took hold, and men, women and children gave a "long pull, and a strong pull, and a pull all-to-gether," and behold the noble ship slid off the rocks and was safely drawn to shore, with the lives saved of all on board; just because the children helped the men and women.

Now, boys and girls this is just what we want you to do. Help us to drag our old ship of state off the breakers of intemperance, thus saving our country and rescuing many precious souls. I am going to ask Miss Anna Gordon to write the next letter to you.

Your true friend,
Miss Anna M. Hammer, Nat. Supt. Juv. Dept.

I pray the prayer of Plato old:
God make thee beautiful within,
And let thine eyes the good behold
In everything save sin!

AT SYCHAR.

BY MRS. MARTHA WINTERMUTE.

Then give me to drink, O Prophet!
That my soul thirst not again.
Weary and faint and often
I have drawn of this well in vain.

From this mountain of Samaria
Riseth my prayer to heaven;
I am weary of sin and labor,
And I long to be forgiven.

I know when Messiah cometh
His blessings will be free;
But how talkest thou, O Prophet!
For ye deal not with such as we.

Then Jesus in spirit feasting,
Forgetting all earthly need,
Gave of His heavenly manna
The fainting woman to feed.

Gave of the living water,
From the well of eternal life,
To the thirsty wayside wanderer,
From the mart of sin and strife.

What though His disciples marvel,
And murmur against His ways;
He came to strengthen the weary,
And the fallen one to raise.

He ever waiteth at Sychar,
For the needy who may draw near;
'Tis the feast and joy of His spirit
The prayer of the lost to hear.

SOME GIRLS.

BY JAMES CLEMENT AMBROSE.

A few weeks ago there boarded the train at B——, Wis., and took seats just at my back, Chicago bound, four or five girls who had seen probably eighteen summers each. (Of life's winter season they had not even dreamed.) Their loud and free gossip told me they were school girls going home. They had the dress marks of what the world often with unmeant satire, calls "good families." The little tufts of lace and linen that now and then fluttered beneath their dainty noses shook out a relish of new-mown hay, though the air of their actions was not laden with the sweet and gentle flavor of green pastures. They sat like semi-Turks, and otherwise lounged till young men turned to look, then turned back to wink at each other. Their waists were slender as the lathe of fashion could turn them, and their heads rattled with the feeble sound of toy bells—which, with another "e," they were.

The news-agent dropped books among them, and one read aloud to her group and others little chips of sentiment. One must have been written by a member of the W. C. T. U., for the character in the story assured her friends: "Lips wet with wine never shall touch mine." "Bah," giggled the school girl, with grammar left out, "them ain't my sentiments."

"Nor mine, you bet," emphatically echoes her seat-mate; "wasn't that a tip-top bottle the boys brought us last night to say good-bye over?"

"Just splendid. Charley's a gay boy. If he'd only talk business."

"Do you s'pose his mother knows how he likes wine?"

"She ought to, for he says the old man always keeps a case in the cellar. But pshaw! I wouldn't mind a little thing like that in a right down good fellow. I like it myself; and what's the use o' living if you can't have a good time. Charley's got too much good sense to go too far."

The girls held on this subject unusually long for them. But boys and champagne seemed to bubble up in their minds as the chief ends in life. Evidently they had attended a late B—— gathering where dancing was on the bill of fare, and they fell to recalling their conquests in that hour.

"Gracious!" said one, "that stubby little rat of a fellow in a cut away was just dead after me; and I let him think 'twas all 'O. K.' I didn't know but he'd propose on the spot. I like a nice 'mash' with a new fellow; don't you?"

"Of course," echoed another. "It kills time the deadest kind while it's on, and is jolly to laugh over for a week. If the fellows knew how we talk about 'em quick's they're off, wouldn't they feel cheap though? Did you see my big 'mash?'"

"What! That rakish-looking Jumbo with black mustache?"

"Yes; do you know, he's a married man."

"Oh my! And then freeze to you the way he did!"

And thus they rattled on at more than train speed through their narrow range of mental rubbish till Chicago whistled them to "down breaks" for that trip and release their fellow travelers.

So sour-mash is not the only mash that intoxicates. I asked myself, what are these crazy creatures worth? then wrote, "zero." They want husbands (after a few years of mashing.) What kind of wives will they make? Another zero. Do they think sensible men admire them? Yes. Are they right? No.

Girls, if you want to be toys, you'll find plenty of toy boys and some mature men, (smart, perhaps, but enemies of virtue,) who will play at the game of pastime with you. But these sports even do not admire you. And you cannot equal them in their derision, if not coarse jest, over your weakness the moment they are out of your hearing, while the young women of earnest purpose and modest carriage make them cowards along that line. And the sharper the fellow you think mashed, the more leprous are his thoughts of you. Yet some of you seem to brave the presence of men you know to be vile; and therefore the young men really worth winning shun you and serious thoughts of you. No teetotal, earnest young man will ask the fair hand he knows tips the wine glass with a love for its contents.

THE PIE QUESTION.

I do crave to say one little word upon the "Pie Question." In the notes of some kind person upon this subject in The Union Signal for March 13 we find an objection to fruit juice in mince pies: "Since nearly all good housekeepers consider a certain degree of fermentation necessary to perfection of mince meat." It is possible to use good common sense even about mince pies, and this little sentence makes a point of departure from sound doctrine concerning the question under consideration. I long since ceased to be a "slave to the moulding board," but I do believe in fairness and do believe there is a word of defense for the mince pie. We read a long, tedious depressing article once upon the dreadful bad qualities of milk as a food. Now with fine, healthy cows, feeding in fragrant clover fields, farmers and farmers' wives are going to look upon such dissertations as the product of unsound thought, and they will not be likely to accept with fairness any doctrine from that source.

A mixture of minced beef and apples to which we add raisins, and boiled cider, or juice of other fruit previously boiled and canned, or better still, jells of fruits, the whole sweetened with molasses and brown sugar, and scalded thoroughly together over a steaming kettle until the mass is dark and rich, everybody knows cannot be in any sense fermented and there can be nothing doubtful in the hospitality that supplies such a pie for the winter holidays. Fruits are among God's best gifts and let us study to advocate a sensible use of them. They cannot always be dried, and they cannot always be fresh, and the juices boiled and canned as jellies partake no more of the nature of fermented drinks than do fruits that are dried and stewed. The daughters wrote "We are coming home Christmas and do have some of your mince pies." And why not?

TOPIC: CHRISTIAN LOVE.

Lesson Text.—I. Cor. 13.

Golden Text.—Love is the fulfilling of the law. Rom. 13:10.

Time.—A. D. 57.

1. This chapter sounds more like a psalm of David than a lesson from the argumentative Paul. The gift of tongues—the first gift following the outpouring of the Holy Spirit—this is but chaff before the inner fire of love. Inspiration even is an endowment less to be desired and longed for than the shedding abroad through the human heart of that divine love which does not need to speak because it can shine.

The seer, the wise man, even the soul full of faith, working wonders in the name of the Lord, all bow before the soul all ablaze with the love of God and His children. An angel's song of praise reaches no higher notes than that of the humblest child on earth, if the child's heart is filled with the love "wherewith He hath loved us."

2. Love is first, not from any intrinsic quality or value, but for what it does. Love fulfills divine law—this is its merit and crown. Every item of the decalogue is obeyed in the spirit as well as the letter, by the true disciple of love. Commands are no burden or restraint to his spirit. Love makes free choice of obedience. Harmony with every law of the universe is its unfailing estate.

3. Furthermore all law can be tested in character by the application of the love principle. Is a law on the human statute book? See to it that it is inspired by and embodies love, human and divine. Does it place the innocent in jeopardy? Then it is not God's law of love. Does it bear heaviest on the weak and helpless? Then Divine love is outraged by it. Does it mar the peace of well doers in order to make gain for the ill doer? Then it is out of harmony with the universe, and so not of God. Test the high license law at this touch stone, and see what will remain of it. The fires of even human love will shrivel and scorch the parchment on which it is written.

4. Liberality and a generous gift are not necessarily fruits of the love that "abideth." The "terrible heart thrill if you have no power of giving," is often better than the largest gift. One may even give himself to others, but not for love's sweet sake. Duty-work is but a poor substitute for love-work. The subjective side of love is the only side on which to see its colors truly portrayed.

5. The heart filled with love is the heart "at leisure from itself." Love suffers and is kind, because self makes no clamor against suffering; envieth not, since love desires the best things to be given to another; is not puffed up, does not behave itself unseemly; seeketh not her own, because self is come down from her pedestal and walks on the level of lowest, humblest things.

Love cannot fail because the divine fountain from which it flows, is exhaustless.

6. Love is complete, all else is partial and on this account must give way, and be swallowed up in the full orbed glory as childhood gives place to maturity. Love is to be the key to knowledge that is perfect. Love is the "heaven to go to heaven in." No break will then occur as we step inside the gates of the Eternal City. Love of the human and the divine endure as we pass out of sight within the pearly walls.

"God's flowers all silently a breath of peace impart."

"KEEP TEMPERANCE OUT OF POLITICS."

Wherever darkness broods, there light is the remedy. Christ says to His followers: "Be not overcome of evil, but overcome evil with good." It is unworthy of our faith to fear lest He upon whose shoulder the government shall be cannot purify the "Stygian pools," if only He is present there in the person of His followers.

"The times are out of joint." Good men have in great measure withdrawn from politics and as a natural consequence "machine methods" and "Bossism" prevail. It was not always thus. In the early days the best Christians and noblest patriots were part and parcel of the government, and they must be again or the Republic is a failure.

But public measures can enlist good men only as they involve the welfare of humanity. The absence of great philanthropic ideas from politics always marks a period of decadence. We can only attract the best characters in the community to caucus and convention by the assurance that living issues will be discussed, and efforts made for human betterment. What subject brought out the votes of three hundred thousand of Ohio's noblest citizens? It was "temperance in politics."

A party shouldered that question of constitutional amendment; a party sent representatives to the senate and the house who voted to submit the great question of outlawing the liquor traffic. Only through parties can we make the slightest movement in the realm of law. This is so trite a saying that it needs but little illustration. In Ohio, the party that submitted the constitutional amendment lost its grip, went back on prohibition and was defeated by the "Christian in politics" who voted an independent ticket, or, having cast his ballot "for the amendment," declined either to bolt his party and vote the independent ticket, or to accept the candidates of his party knowing they were pledged to license. But in Iowa a party has gone further, and after submitting prohibition has stood by it through cloud and sunshine until it is a fact accomplished. During the period when temperance people are working for the adoption of a constitutional amendment it is well not to accent more strongly than we must, the political (or party) feature of the movement.

When the statute is secured its recognition is inevitable, for then the voting population is sharply outlined in two opposing camps in every municipality; one favorable to the enforcement of law, the other anxious to make it a dead letter.

This is the invariable history of the "thirty years war" for prohibition and will to be the end. But when you have two opposing camps of voters on the issue of making or enforcing prohibitory law you have "temperance in politics." Every step taken toward inducing the state to go out of partnership with the liquor traffic is a step into politics, a step toward enlisting the interest of Christian voters and hence a sure step toward the purification of "the Stygian pool."

Good men are waking from their lethargy. It is no longer regarded as a Christian act to "keep temperance out of politics." Wherever the Goliath of the liquor power sends forth his challenge, there the temperance Davids rally; and since the doughty giant is today the chief figure in the political arena, "Home versus the Saloon" is the war cry; and as the temperance soldiers rally for the fray it will be seen ere long that no party can win in America unless it frankly and earnestly espouses the cause of HOME.

Ex-Gov. St. John of Kansas, has just concluded a most successful lecture trip in Illinois, speaking nineteen times in this state. The most flattering reports have been received from places where he has spoken. Immense crowds have flocked to hear his fearless advocacy of prohibition,—the proofs of its success in Kansas, and his withering denunciations of cowardly politicians, who have not the courage to do right, "for fear of hurting the party." He predicts a wonderful breaking up in the ranks of the republican party, if it still persists in enacting the great political show and farce of bearing aloft a licensed saloon on one shoulder and a Sunday school on the other.

The people are tired and disgusted with "hob-nobbing" politicians, wishy-washy, high license, pseudo temperance men, and are asking to see and to hear men whose feet are planted on the solid rock, and whose spinal columns are made of bone, and not of India rubber.

When the republican party forces such men from its ranks, by its cowardly obeisance to the liquor oligarchy, it is no wonder it stands before the world as limp as an empty meal sack. "Ichabod" should be inscribed upon its headstone. Whittier's pathetic lines on Webster's fall, express the situation.

"O! dumb be passion's stormy rage,
When he who might
Have lighted up and led his age,
Falls back in night.

* * * * * * *

When faith is lost, when honor dies,
The man is dead.—(So is the party.)
Then pay the reverence of old days
To its dead fame;
Walk backward with averted gaze,
And hide the shame."

Gov. St. John was not able to respond to all invitations. Mrs. G. H. Read of Bloomington, made the engagements for this lecture trip and will probable secure a promise for his return to the state at some future time.

THE political track is now open and the presidential candidates are paced up and down before the American public. In the popular press all their points are paraded in review saving only that there is ominous silence touching their temperance records.

Suppose we look at those of the republican candidates. James G. Blaine recently proposed in a letter over his own signature to pay back to each state its government tax on alcoholic liquors. This puts a premium on the amount of that tax in each and appeals for a continuance of the traffic directly to the pocket books of the business community. Mr. Blaine offers wine at his table and deems total abstinence a mild form of lunacy.

George F. Edmunds sneered in open senate at Senator Blair's national constitutional amendment, satirized that senator's attempt to make the use of alcoholics a cause of non-promotion in the civil service, and himself freely uses and offers wine.

Chester A. Arthur is a well known bon vivant, and by his habits and opinions is an opponent of the temperance movement.

John A. Logan's favorite scheme is to make the liquor traffic support the public schools, thus attempting to yoke our educational system in the unholiest alliance known to history.

Robert Lincoln whose father pledged in cold water the committee who announced to him his nomination for president, is a social drinker of wine.

John Sherman of Ohio was champion of the bonded whisky bill in the senate, speaks soft works to liquor dealers always, and was the quiet but uncompromising enemy of the W. C. T. U. of his state in its great battle for constitutional amendment. Put none but teetotalers on guard this year. More anon.

A TEMPERANCE Normal Institute under the auspices of the department of Hygiene and Heredity of the W. C. T. U. of the District of Columbia, will be held at Washington, beginning May 6 or 7, and continuing two or more days. The program will be similar to the one presented at the recent Michigan Normal Institute, and will contain in a nutshell as much relating to the work and study in these two departments as is possible in the time allotted.

Through the courtesy of the Washington ladies we are permitted to say that adjoining states are invited to send delegates who will be entertained by the W. C. T. .U of that city.

The meeting of the American Medical association occurs on the same days, and it is hoped to secure a few lectures from the eminent sanitarians and medical men and women who will be in attendance.

"The shield is better than the spear" in temperance work, and the conferences of women on the great matters of wholesome living, "now and here," and bequeathing a wholesome inheritance to the next generation, deserve and demand sacrifices on the part of the students in our W. C. T. U. If delegates cannot afford the expenses of travel and incidentals, the societies appointing them should consider such outlay a legitimate one, and provide accordingly.

LAST week was a good one for political conventions. In several states the republican party nominated its candidates and formulated its platforms. In the latter we mark a shrewd avoidance of all really live issues. The temperance question is severely let alone and the maneuvers by which it is dodged remind one of the old Indian who one day entered the clean cabin of a white settler in the early days of Maine. The housekeeper trembled inwardly as the tobacco juice which the old barbarian freely showered upon the well scrubbed floor, stained its whiteness beyond her power to cleanse. She produced a rather primitive and improvised cuspidor, setting it conveniently near him, but to no purpose. He persistently avoided it, going out of his way to divert the brown liquid from its basin. She placed it nearer, and yet again edged it more perfectly into range, but the old man only dodged it the more carefully until at last despairing of keeping the jets and sprays from touching it, he broke out: "Ef ye don't git that ar pesky thing out o' my way, I shall spit in it."

The political savages are not yet ready for the civilization of our neat handed housekeeping.

NEVER before in the history of the W. C. T. U., has there been so general and widespread effort on its part in the local elections, as is evidenced by the work of the last few weeks, and not recently has any effort been so widely successful. Even where the result has been not in accordance with our hopes, the amount of public sentiment manufactured and conserved by the campaign has abundantly repaid all effort. Of Illinois towns we have assurance that a larger number have gone no-license this year than at any time since the famous home protection campaign of five years ago. Several cities, Sandwich and Monmouth chief among them, having tried high license for one year, have this year returned to prohibition. In Monmouth after a thousand dollar license regime, every ward has risen to say "The high toned saloon must go." In no case is the result more gratifying than in the city of Denver, Colorado, which is enjoying its first prohibition triumph. The W. C. T. U. gets its due share of credit for these victories, planned and executed in large measure by the local societies.

THE Burlington Hawkeye lately, for "Sunday reading," dished up a lot of interviews with the saloon keepers respecting their opinion of the new prohibitory statute. Of course all thought it would be detrimental to the state, some that it would be enforced and were going to move away (which of course would collapse the whole business of the city). Some were "going to Chicago or St. Louis where they would be safe" from the annoyances incident to such one-horse towns, and others said it would not be enforced and they would remain and defy it. Query: If Iowa did not punish murder with the death penalty, and the legislature were suddenly to enact that punishment would the Hawkeye interview all the murderers awaiting trial as to their opinions of the new law? And who would care for their opinions, if it should?

THE convention of county superintendents of public schools, and other educators, recently held in Richmond, Va., unanimously adopted the following resolution, introduced into the body under the influence of the W. C. T. U. of that city:

That in the opinion of this conference it would be wise and expedient for the Board of Education to place among the text books for use in the public schools of this state a text book on "Alcohol: Its Nature and Effects upon the Human System."

The convention numbered among its members such well known gentlemen as Dr. Henry of the Peabody Fund, Gen. Armstrong of the Hampton School, Pres. Conrad of Blacksburg College, and others. The southern states will not be slow to follow in the steps of Michigan, Vermont, New Hampshire and New York.

A CALL comes from Maine saying that any temperance speaker who may be willing to give a week's work gratis in Maine for the constitutional amendment, is invited to correspond with the corresponding secretary of the W. C. T. U., Miss Sarah C. Lord, Kennebunk, Maine. Miss Willard has already, unsolicited, offered such amount of free service.

The situation is a peculiar one and demands sacrifice, but the workers may receive as much as they bestow.

Two distinguished English temperance workers are in America, the Rev. T. H. Barker, secretary of the United Kingdom Temperance Alliance, and Mr. William Hoyle, the great statistician, whom we are happy to number among our contributors. They are now en route to Colorado, having visited the eastern cities, and will be in Chicago in May. A hearty welcome awaits them.

HERE is an opinion that has weight and force as coming from that eminent lawyer and statesman the Hon. Geo. W. McCrary of Keokuk, who lately sent it as his message to the W. C. T. U. of his own city. "You do well to make war not upon the saloon keepers, but upon the saloon itself, for its presence in any community, especially if protected by law, is a standing menace to all that we ought to hold dear. The saloon is the foe of intelligence, virtue, morality and religion, and it fosters ignorance, vice, poverty and crime. It has not one redeeming quality. It is evil and only evil, and the terrible consequences which flow from it are patent to all who are not willfully blind. I believe, therefore, that the liquor saloon ought to be prohibited by law, condemned by an enlightened public sentiment, outlawed by decent society, shunned by every good citizen, and at the earliest possible moment abolished from the face of the earth."

CONNECTI-CUTTINGS

Essex.—We have a small W. C. T. U. here which insists that it "is not of much account;" still it has persisted in keeping the temperance banners flying and under its auspices, our citizens have from time to time been advised by many of our eminent speakers. Among these Mrs. Youmans, Mrs. Hunt, Mrs. Foster and lastly Mrs. A. M. Palmer of Iowa, have presented various phases of our work. Mrs. Palmer, the devoted state evangelist of the W. C. T. U. of Iowa, has been spending several months in Boston, in attendance upon Dr. Culles' faith institute, with the double object of resting from public work for a season; and of learning the way of the Lord more perfectly.

Mrs. Palmer occupied Mr. Washington's pulpit in the morning, and addressed a union meeting at night, greatly to the edification of the people.

NEW JERSEY.

Beverly.—Is a lovely place, situated on the Delaware river on the Jersey shore. Blessed with health, beauty and affluence, with five churches, and as many Sabbath schools, and day schools, it seemed that we had all we might desire, but for the taverns. The women of the W. C. T. U. have labored for three years, hoping that a brighter day might come.

We were rejoiced when for one year we were without a licensed hotel in the town, then our hopes were dashed to the ground by seeing the dens of iniquity voted open by the councilmen of Beverly. This winter we heard of the wonderful work Messrs Mabee and English had been instrumental in doing in Flemington, and succeeded in making arrangements with them for a temperance campaign to commence Friday March 28.

The meetings were well attended but the majority was always in favor of the women. Mr. Mabee asked on the fourth evening "if we had any men in our city?" and requested every lady to send a man to the mens' meeting on the following evening. It was a little thing to ask, and the ladies complied with the request, the Y. M. C. A. Hall was filled with men and a reform club was organized with sixty-eight names. The list is still increasing, numbering now about 125 names. These men attended the meetings, in a body, to the consternation of the tavern-keepers, who recognized in the ranks many of their best customers. A large number have been added to the W. C. T. U. (We have now sixty-nine members) and our Band of Hope numbers sixty.

Mrs. Addie T. Barras, Cor. Sec.

WISCONSIN NOTES.

The Trempeleau union has organized a large Band of Hope. The meetings held on Sunday afternoon are well attended and deep interest is manifested.

The Ashland union has opened a reading room.

Mrs. E. C. Wright, of Grand Rapids, Mich., is at work in the ninth district, lecturing and organizing. Her earnest efforts are meeting with deserved success.

The new union at Maiden Rock is growing finely and is preparing for vigorous work. We suspect that Pierce county will have the first county convention held in Wisconsin.

The Menasha Band of Hope gave an entertainment on the evening of March 30, which was very satisfactory in its results.

Our superintendent of juvenile work, Mrs. Eva C. Griffith, is seriously ill at her home in Whitewater. Mrs. Griffith will not be able to fill any of her spring appointments, but hopes to resume her work in early summer.

A few days before election the secretary of the New Richmond union wrote that the union women were beginning to find that "the lions in the way" of work for the "no-license" ticket were "chained lions, and stuffed ones at that" and now she writes that the "no-license" ticket was elected by a very large majority. On the day of the election the union held prayer meetings, in the morning from nine o'clock until twelve, and from two until four in the afternoon. One lady eighty-six years of age was present and prayed most earnestly for the success of the temperance cause.

S. P. Bradish.

VERMONT.

Derby Line.—Our union was organized in 1877 as an "Independent International Union," the ladies of Stanstead Plain and Rock Island, Province of Quebec, having united with those of Derby Line, Vt., in forming a W. C. T. U., and was in a flourishing condition the first and second years. Public meetings were held and we were occasionally favored with prominent speakers from abroad.

In July 1880 Miss Frances E. Willard spent a few days in this vicinity and addressed several public meetings; a better plan of work was placed before the union, and a re-organization was effected. We have been in a prosperous condition since.

In 1881 and also in 1882 Mrs. J Ellen Foster was with us and addressed large audiences.

In February of 1883 Mrs. Youmans addressed meetings at Stanstead Plain, Rock Island and Derby Line. At that time our union passed a resolution asking affiliation with the Provincial union. At present we report, through the different departments, to the Vermont state union and also to the Provincial union, contributing half our membership fees to each. We have held our regular meetings weekly, and have had either a lecture or a temperance social monthly. Our Band of Hope has had a prominent part in our entertainments.

Situated as we are on the "border" we have found plenty to do. While carrying on a vigorous campaign against the license system on the Canada side we have found time for earnest and persistent efforts for the suppression of illegal traffic on the Vermont side.

We have bombarded the municipal council of Stanstead with petitions and the board of license commissioners with remonstrances The resident clergy have nobly and fearlessly assisted us in our battle for the right. Faithful and fearless temperance men in our community have stood firmly shoulder to shoulder in this great work.

Our prayers have been answered; we have succeeded in arousing public sentiment to a white heat against the liquor traffic.

Our next work will be a campaign for the adoption of the Scott Act in the county of Stanstead, and an effort for the better enforcement of the Vermont prohibitory law at Derby Line. We have secured Mrs. Emily L. McLaughlin for the 26th inst., and are looking forward to a rare treat.

Mrs. L. E. Blodgett.

TEXAS.

Sherman.—The W. C. T. U. died out in this city a number of months ago, but by God's blessing and the aid of some of his most efficient servants it has been resurrected. Most all of us thought that rum must rule in Sherman until something turned up to put it down, and so concluded to wait till that something came, but, one day a good sister from New York came to us and proposed to a few ladies the holding of a weekly temperance prayer meeting. The suggestion was followed and put in practice. For weeks less than half a dozen met each week. Then Miss H. G. Moore, from the National W. C. T. U. came to us and by two lectures full of earnestness and eloquent truths moved the hearts of many. The day after the lectures the union was partially reorganized, a president only being elected.

The Sunday following, Mrs. Fixen of Minnesota, came to the city and in two lectures stirred the feeling already kindled by Miss Moore into a blaze. At night she spoke in the Congregational church to an audience filling pews and standing room completely. Hundreds were turned away. We had heard of her as a "Minnesota cyclone." Surely she destroyed some false ideas regarding the liquor traffic and thus justified the name. Monday the ladies met together and completed the organization. Mrs. Fixen secured a club for The Union Signal. Some temperance literature has been ordered, and the women propose to try by their efforts to carry on a work so necessary in this town.

Sherman is the hardest field in north Texas for temperance workers; saloons are constantly increasing, and many who have the cause at heart, are fearful of opposing the rum traffic lest their business be destroyed. Others have been discouraged by the steady gain of the liquor element, and say despondingly "Nothing can be done."

But we'll watch and wait, work and pray and believe God will show us results.

Mrs. E. J. Sanborne, Vice Pres. 5th Cong. Dist.

FIFTH DISTRICT CONVENTION.

The fifth congressional district W. C. T. U., held its ninth annual convention April 1-4 at Portland. It was one of the most interesting and profitable meetings ever held in the district. Pastors of the different churches were present at nearly all of the sessions, taking part in the discussions, and in many ways contributing to the general interest.

The reports of corresponding secretary and county presidents showed a good degree of activity in all the different lines of work, and in truth it could not be otherwise while we have as our leader so indefatigable a worker as Mrs. A. S. Benjamin. The convention evinced its appreciation of her worth by re-electing her to the office of president.

Mrs. P. J. Howard who has for seven years faithfully discharged the duties of corresponding secretary of the district, has removed to Petoskey, and much to our regret, another was elected to that office. Superintendents of departments were appointed as follows:

Flower mission, Mrs. H. M. Wilson, Ionia; Work among railroad employes, Mrs. F. C. Stratton, Grand Rapids; Juvenile and Sabbath school work, Mrs. L. K. Showman, Portland; Influencing the press, Mrs. Waldo, Wayland; School ballot, Mrs. J. M. Wheeler, Grand Rapids; Finance, Mrs. A. S. Benjamin, Maple; Heredity and hygeine, Mrs. H. Spring, Grand Rapids; Legislation, Mrs. C. D. Hodges, Grand Rapids; Work among colored people, Mrs. D. G. Garnsey, Grand Rapids.

Among the resolutions passed was one endorsing the fourth passed by the national convention in Detroit, in reference to franchise; one pledging the members to vote at school meetings; one expressing sympathy with the principles declared by the union party.

By a vote passed during the convention the fifth district is pledged to assist in circulating the petition for national constitutional prohibition, and the work will begin as soon as copies of the petition are received.

In point of numbers, the fifth district carries the banner, and we intend that she shall be equally true as to amount of work accomplished.

Much credit is due to several gentlemen of Portland, Mr. E. M. Allen, Rev. M. M. Callen, Clarence Cole, Rev. Mr. Smith, Mr. Jones, Rev. Mr. Cannon and Rev. Mr. Bothwell for the success of the evening sessions of the convention.

Owing to prevailing high water, Mrs. Mary T. Lathrap was unable to reach Portland to give the address on Wednesday evening as announced, and these gentlemen much to the gratification of delegates and visitors, kindly consented to occupy the time with short addresses.

The choir also deserve special mention, as their music, both vocal and instrumental, as under the leadership of Rev. Mr. Callen their music was very fine.

Mrs. J. M. Wheeler, Cor. Sec.

NEBRASKA.

Fremont.—Ours is one of the centennial unions, organized in 1876, with twenty members. A kind friend offering us the use of an apartment, we at once fitted up and opened a free reading room. A disbanded temperance organization presented to us a book case containing about one hundred books which had constituted its library. These became the nucleus of a loan library now numbering several hundred volumes. Two years later we purchased the building we occupied and removed it to a lot which we leased in a more desirable situation. This lot we have since bought and now own a valuable property centrally located in the business part of the city. We gladly acknowledge the generous responses given by the public whenever we have appealed for aid, either for these or other objects. When our high license law was passed, and our saloons boldly attempted to proceed as if it had never been enacted, we were able to bring the matter before the district attorney, and all were compelled to take out the new licenses. Further than this, however, the law is practically disregarded.

We are, just now, studying earnestly, to devise some means of enforcing its restraining provisions. Naturally this is difficult of accomplishment, while our city officials and most of our higher magistrates are regularly elected by the saloon element. Our last election resulted more favorably for our hopes than any for some time past, and we pluck up fresh heart, believing that the indifferent better class of our citizens is growing restive and will not long submit to this disgraceful domination.

Two weeks ago, Mrs. Baxter spent three days with us. General admiration is expressed for her clearness, her earnestness, strong good sense and forcible reasoning. We believe she has left impressions upon many thinking minds, that will remain. We, of the union, are full of thanks for her kindly advice, her words of good cheer, and wish her "God speed" wherever her future way may lie.

Mrs. Ida Moe.

IOWA.

Tabor.—Fremont county has been moving forward in the temperance work within the last year or a little more. Previous to that we had only one live union, at Sidney, though there had been one at Hamburg. About one year ago Mrs. Palmer came into this county and organized unions at Tabor and Randolph. Since that time through the efforts of Mary E. Lawrence, district vice-president, ably assisted by Mrs. M. F. Beavers, district evangelist, there have been unions organized in Imogene, Plum Hollow, Percival and Farragut. We held one joint convention with Mills county at Tabor, and are making preparations for a county convention in May. Now I want to give you a little account of the work being done in Tabor. We have next to the largest union in the state (though our little city numbers not over five hundred inhabitants) as shown by dues reported.

At the request of the different pastors we hold a public meeting one Sabbath evening every quarter.

Three months ago we had the great pleasure of securing Miss Lucia Kimball, who was very much liked by all who heard her. A collection of over fifteen dollars was taken at that time. The sixth of April being our next regular time, our committee made arrangements with Professors Todd and Nettleton of our college to address us. Prof. Todd gave us an address on "The Present Outlook, with a Retrospective Glance." He proved by able arguments that prohibition laws will not prohibit, unless enforced by willing officers; and even good officers need public sentiment to uphold them, and public sentiment needs not only agitation to form it aright, but organization to give it power to accomplish its designs. Very skillfully he opened the way for Prof. Nettleton to make some pointed remarks and to ask the pertinent question, "Will you see that the prohibition laws are enforced in Tabor?" He then made the following motion: "I move that we request the W. C. T. U. to appoint a committee of twenty-one (of whom at least one-third shall belong to their association) said committee to prepare the basis of a League for the Prevention and Punishment of Crime. Also that we request this committee to report to the public as soon as convenient." After a few decidedly approving remarks made by several leading men in the audience, it was put to vote. The congregation arose so unanimously that the opposing vote was not called for.

Now in view of the fact that the speakers chose their subjects, with not even a suggestion from our committee we feel as one sister said, "Now we can pray on with renewed courage." And another good Methodist sister said, "I wanted to say right in meeting, God bless the brethren."

Our town is not cursed with an open saloon, but we know there is plenty of whisky, and this move is just what our W. C. T. U. have been laboring and praying for ever since its organization. M. E. L.

PENNSYLVANIA.

Wayne County.—One week of earnest temperance work in our county by Miss E. E. Underhill, of New York, has greatly stirred the people on this important subject. She came into our county on March 24, spending two days at Waymart where she organized a most promising union. At Ariel she spoke to a crowded house, greatly strengthening the union there. At Salem the Lord signally owned the word spoken, and the people were so aroused from their state of indifference, as to say, "We must have a union here, we must also have a share in this work."

Hawley.—Here Miss Underhill gave her first lecture, March 28. Her subject was "Casting into the Treasury" and she made every one to feel that all are casting their influence either into the treasury of our Lord or of Satan.

The next afternoon she held a parlor meeting, which was largely attended and a number of new members were added to our union.

Sabbath morning she addressed a large audience in the M. E. church from Psalms 1: 1. "Blessed is the man that walketh not in the counsel of the ungodly, nor standeth in the way of sinners, nor sitteth in the seat of the scornful." Her reliance upon God and her positive conviction of being on the side of right, carried her audience with her, swaying them as perceptibly as the mighty wind playing upon the forest.

Her great power seems to be in drawing all hearts nearer to Jesus and when drawn so near that we feel the beatings of that great heart of love, we are made to feel that "for others' sake" even the timid woman must come out from her seclusion and help to raise the fallen and throw a shield around her own home and loved ones, by helping to remove the many snares set for unwary feet.

Again we followed her to the Presbyterian church for the evening, and this large church was filled to overflowing, notwithstanding the inclemency of the weather. It seemed to us that God's storehouse was full of things both new and old, and our dear sister was given the key.

Here she spoke from Nehemiah 4, 6: "So built we the the wall," handling it in a most masterly manner. The great audience composed so largely of intelligent men, were made to realize the fact that upon them rested the great responsibility of law making. She also very touchingly appealed to those signing applications for license. Her work among us has proved a great blessing and we hear people saying, "I never understood this subject so clearly before."

We had a good working union here in Hawley, but it is greatly strengthened now. The liquor dealers had become so lawless that a short time ago our W. C. T. U. sent the following notice to all dealers; and it has had very good effect.

"To ——— of the borough of Hawley. You are hereby respectfully cautioned to carefully observe the liquor law under which you are licensed, in refraining from selling on Sundays and to such persons as the law forbids. By order of W. C. T. U. — date."

So far as practicable these notices were delivered by some of our most responsible ladies, a few being sent through the mail. Mrs. E. L. Stephens, Pres.

NEW YORK.

Watertown.—Our organization is an outcome of Mrs. Mary Hunt's visit here last December, and for the benefit of tired, and perhaps discouraged workers, I would like to relate at some length the story of our early days.

For Mrs. Hunt's lecture the chapel of one of our smaller churches had been secured, and yet, such was the apathy here in regard to the temperance cause, it quite sufficed for the number who gathered to hear her. When she rose to speak none of our city pastors, not even the one in whose church she stood, was present to introduce her! And when, at the close of her lecture, the question was asked if the ladies would meet her the following day to organize a W. C. T. U. and only two or three hands were raised, what wonder if she felt both disheartened and annoyed, if she, whose services were in such demand and who was accustomed to address large and enthusiastic audiences, should have felt the time wasted? However, nine, ladies did meet her in the Y. M. C. A. rooms the next afternoon, and, after some explanations and advice from Mrs. Hunt pledged themselves to do all in their power for the cause of temperance, and to awaken an interest in others. This pledge some of them faithfully kept, and January 15 a meeting was called for the purpose of organizing a local W. C. T. U. About fifty were present, and elected officers and adopted a modified form of the National constitution.

Our first work was circulating the petition for "scientific temperance instruction in the public schools," but owing to our beginning so very late, and having so few workers, we only succeeded in getting six hundred signatures; still, we trust these may have had some influence, as the senator from our city voted against the bill the first time, but when it was brought up a second time, reconsidered the matter and voted for it.

At our second meeting we resolved to open an industrial school and kitchen garden. A light, centrally located room was rented and fitted up for the purpose, and, with prettily papered walls, matting on the floor, and small open stove, really looks very attractive. Miss McClees spent a week with us early in March, and enthusiastic class of ladies in the kitchen garden system. All were charmed with this representative of the N. W. C. T. U. and she was a great help to us in many ways.

March 8 we opened our industrial school with nine pupils, the next week there were twenty-four, and last Saturday, thirty-one. We have not as yet attempted any direct temperance instruction, but we have singing, recite the Lord's prayer together, and distribute Miss Colman's pretty cards.

In the kitchen garden department, we have two classes, one a paid class, with twenty-two girls in each, and could easily have one or two more if the teachers felt equal to undertaking them.

We have also started a mother's class. Much of the work given out by our charity bureau was so miserably done that our ladies were convinced that some of the mothers needed instruction as much as the children.

We have a prayer meeting every Monday afternoon, and a business meeting once a month.

The literature committee has placed packets of tracts in the two depots and five or six of the machine shops.

Our membership has reached very nearly a hundred and our finances are in a very satisfactory state.

Now the moral of all this story, which I specially commend to Mrs. Hunt and all the busy workers of the W. C. T. U. is: "In the morning sow thy seed, and in the evening withhold not thy hand, for thou knowest not which shall prosper, either this or that, or whether they both shall be alike good."

Harriet H. Keyes, Sec.

RHODE ISLAND.

Providence.—On Friday, March 28, an important quarterly meeting of the executive committee of the Rhode Island W. C. T. U. was held at headquarters in Providence. Especial importance attached to the occasion, from the fact that both branches of the general assembly had just approved the recommendation to the people of the prohibitory amendment to the constitution. While the women fully realized that the conflict had but just begun, and that the Red Sea and the desert might be before them, they were filled with gratitude that they had been led thus far.

Almost every union was represented at this meeting by delegates or by letters. The reports were encouraging and showed a generally healthy condition.

The reports of the superintendents of departments were also very gratifying, showing good work done all along the line.

Miss E. A. Lawson, of Pawtucket was appointed to fill the vacancy in the superintendency of temperance instruction in schools. This lady has recently placed temperance text-books in the hands of fifty teachers in Pawtucket carrying with her a personal influence and enthusiasm that were contagious.

The report in the evangelistic department showed that during the quarter, there had been given by the president, Mrs. J. K. Barney, by the secretaries and other state officers more than a hundred sermons, addresses and Bible readings, not including the regular temperance addresses.

The ladies had come prepared for a basket lunch and at noon went to the coffee rooms of the Y. W. C. T. U., where they were supplied with tea and coffee at the expense of the Providence union.

In the afternoon, the tenth anniversary exercises of the Providence union were held at the Central Baptist church. Reports and addresses of an interesting character occupied the time.

The evening services consisted, after the usual opening exercises of the report of the corresponding secretary, Miss L. W. Thompson, a historical paper, by Mrs. S. Clough, for a long time secretary, in the early years of the union, and addressed by Mrs. W. T. Bainbridge, the first president of both Providence and Rhode Island W. C. T. U's., and Mrs. J. K. Barney, the present state president. A very enjoyable reading was given by Mrs. Minnie Porter.

Two very pleasent little episodes were the presentation to the president of the Providence union Mrs. G. F. Martin, and the retiring secretary, Miss Thompson beautiful baskets of flowers. E. S. Burlingame.

Westerly.—The next meeting of the Westerly W. C. T. U. will probably be an occasion of jubilation, owing to the victory recently achieved in this town over the license faction by 200 majority. A considerable number of these two hundred were probably influenced by the action of the W. C. T. U.

Westerly has been a no-license town for many years; nevertheless, by reason of the existence in the community of a low policy on the liquor question, a council has been elected annually with a majority of either license men or neutrals, and while under theoretical no-license we have been under practical license, the unrestrained (except by occasional private effort) sale by druggists and saloonists and indulgence by clubs going on year after year until prohibitionists have become sick at heart at the situation. In view of this state of the evil, it was thought to be the duty of our temperance organizations to make a strong effort for no-license, both theoretically and practically this year; and as a preliminary step it was decided by the W. C. T. U. two days before town meeting to issue the following through the mail to the voters:

April 1, 1884.

The Woman's Christian Temperance Union of Westerly earnestly request that you cast your vote at the election Wednesday for no-license, for the sake of God, and home, and native land. A. C. Griffin, Pres.

E. S. M. Wilbur, Sec.

I have already indicated the result of this action. The W. C. T. U. propose, now that no-license has again been voted, to use their influence to the end that the evil of practical license may be put away. E. R. C.

ILLINOIS.

Wheaton.—The W. C. T. U. has been laying some foundation stones during the past year of high license in this town.

Early in the winter we had a lecture from Mrs. J. Ellen Foster that thrilled the people and left impressions that can never be forgotten. A few weeks later Miss Frances Willard came to attend the Du Page county W. C. T. U. convention held in Wheaton and clinched the nails Mrs. Foster had driven. Meantime our local union has been wide awake filling in around, putting in a prayer where we could not a stone.

Just before our election George Woodford came under the auspices of the Du Page county Temperance Union, Mr. A. B. Curtis, president, and held five evening meetings. He cleared away all the driftwood and rubbish making the liquor traffic stand out so hideous and venomous and like the slimy reptile that it is.

Three hundred men and women signed the pledge while some of the Y. W. C. T. U. made themselves useful, fastening on the white ribbon badges.

One hundred and thirty children took the triple pledge and badge of red, white and blue.

Most of the churches gave up their Sabbath evening service and joined with Mr. Woodford in a grand closing effort.

On election day as the men gathered to vote the women assembled in a hall near by to pray. It was one continuous day of prayer and the temperance men with white badges, and carriages with white banners, all in God's providence helped to gain the victory.

At 8 o'clock p. m. the news was carried to the prayer room, where were assembled a large concourse of people, that the prohibition ticket was carried by a large majority thus fulfilling the scripture in Proverbs 10: "The hope of the righteous shall be gladness, but the expectation of the wicked shall perish." M. L. S.

Rockford.—The W. C. T. U. of Rockford, held its tenth anniversary exercise on Thursday, March 27. The meeting for election of officers was held in the afternoon, and in the evening a mass meeting in Court street M. E. church. This church was the place in which the ladies assembled for their first meeting.

The most interesting exercise of the evening, was a brief review of the ten years' work of the union, by Mrs. Henry. The time allotted to her seemed altogether too short, so full of interest were her remarks.

The report of the treasurer showed that the coffee house had been successful financially. Receipts from coffee house and union had exceeded $4,000, and the balance in treasury exceeded $1,200.

The corresponding secretary stated the present membership to be 224. Forty-six meetings held during the year with an average attendance of twenty-nine. Five members had been removed by death. Several magazines and papers in addition to those taken last year, furnished for the reading room. The Band of Hope which was under the auspices of its Y. M. C. A. last year, has been reorganized, under the W. C. T. U. Is now well officered and prospering to such an extent that the room in which they hold their meetings is too small and they call for more room.

A Y. W. C. T. U. has been organized within a few weeks, and starts out well in numbers and enthusiasm.

A colored union, auxiliary to the W. C. T. U., called the "Amethyst Temperance Union," has a large membership and seems to take a lively interest in the work.

The gospel meetings held regularly on Sunday afternoons and Monday evenings have been the means, through God, of converting many souls. Our ladies have also taken up jail work.

A lecture course committee has been appointed by the union who will endeavor to bring some of the best lecturers to our city."

After this report a short and pleasant address was given by Dr. Kellogg of the reform club.

A comprehensive little poem on "High License" written by one of our citizens was read by Mrs. Grant, elocutionist. An appropriate song by the choir closed the exercises of the anniversary.

Corresponding Secretary.

ILLINOIS NOTES OF REJOICING.

Metamora.—Let us rise and sing the temperance doxology. For the first time in twelve years an anti-license ticket is elected in Metamora, except the clerk. The W. C. T. U. was at the polls all day with tickets, persuasion and hot coffee. Prayer-meeting at headquarters morning and afternoon. Band of Hope out at 4 o'clock. The result of the day's work gives five anti-license men on the village board.

Mt. Vernon.—The rum power received its death blow in this city. Our city election resulted in 120 majority for anti-license. Temperance ticket carried in every ward. The board now stands five to two, mayor and one alderman for license. We thank God and take courage.

Belvidere.—Ex-Gov. St. John has just been with us, stirring all hearts by his grand, strong words. Though we lost the election we are thankful that we can say our "reform boys" did nobly, all voting no license. At our annual county teachers' institute, the first week in April, we secured the presentation of scientific temperance instruction and a resolution was unanimously adopted, expressing heartiest sympathy with the Illinois W. C. T. U. in their efforts in this department, and pledging co-operation. M. R.

Effingham.—Last year we lost the election by 290 votes, this year by only 66 votes. The Band of Hope marched and created quite an enthusiasm.

Reports from various towns throughout the state indicate that the elections were almost uniformly fought on the issue of license or no license. In the following places the temperance people won: Casey, Earl, Jonesboro, Martinsville, Monticello, Taylorville, Woodstock, Mt. Morris, Leaf River, Byron, Oregon, Sandwich, Chebanse, Dwight, Moweaqua, Sheldon, Plano, Eureka, and Decatur.

Lexington.—A grand victory—98 majority—read 103d Psalm. The license party boarded men thirty days. The union held an all-day prayer meeting. Several gentlemen sent their names in during the day accompanied by a $1, saying they wanted their membership to date from that day.

Lanark.—Our city election resulted in a no license victory. Council stands five to one. Total majority in the city, fifty-eight.

Macomb.—That grand old doxology, "Praise God from whom all blessings flow," is ringing in every heart in the Macomb W. C. T. U. April 15, 1884, is the best day this city has ever seen. No license by one hundred and ninety-one majority! A gain of one hundred and fifty votes over last year. The union held a prayer meeting in the M. E. church from eight o'clock a. m. until seven p. m.

Monmouth.—Praise God from whom all blessings flow. From thirty-five to forty majority in each ward. High license is voted a failure.

Lena.—Thank the Lord with us. Lena elected a no license board of five trustees by a majority of forty-one in a vote of 336. Has been license for past two years.

Carthage.—City election passed off quietly yesterday. The whole anti license board elected. Our city begins to take on the airs of a veteran in this prohibition conflict. We are starting out on our fourteenth year. Our hearts are all rejoicing over the victory in Galesburg. Our dear president deserves the joy this will bring to her.

Other Illinois towns that have chosen prohibition: Delavan, Mason City, Sandwich, Decatur, Lewistown, Leaf River, Byron, Oregon, Mt. Morris, Foreston, Creston, Shannon, Washburn, Earl, Barry, Lexington, Leland, Lanark, Polo, Davis, Pecatonica, Warren.

MICHIGAN.

Somerset Center.—A union has just been organized here under the supervision of Mrs. L. M. Boise. Our number is small as yet, but we mean business.

Mrs. J. T. Bryant, Cor. Sec.

Ninth District.—We are urging upon our school boards the importance of introducing kindergarten teaching into our public schools and are hoping to secure Mrs. Sarah B. Cooper to aid us in this effort. The Muskegon board seems to favor this plan, and we hope to be successful throughout the district.

Superintendent Kindergarten Dept.

Decatur.—The crusade in the early spring of 1874 awakened to "newness of life" (how much this means) a circle of devoted women in Decatur, who went out and in among the filthy saloons praying both in the saloons and out on the streets, exhorting and laboring and have continued, until now their labors are rewarded, this day their prayers answered. Decatur being one of the villages organized under the general law, could take advantage of the "local option" feature of the law of 1883; and the village board, by unanimous vote has passed an ordinance prohibiting the sale of liquor in that village. Michigan statutes make such action possible, and if every woman could be counted upon in our cities and villages I believe most profoundly that a choice would be uttered in our state, that would be overwhelming. I have just had a little experience in canvassing for an expression on this subject of opening saloons and am wonderfully impressed with the facts. Woman's enfranchisement has been earnestly advocated by the leading W. C. T. U. workers in this town for the last seven years, Mr. and Mrs. H. Upton leading the work, and it is doubtless also due to this instrumentality in the county that in three towns women are this spring elected as school inspectors.

For Decatur.

AN OPEN LETTER.

Big Rapids.—The law relating to the conditions and liabilities of bonds given by persons who wish to make a living by selling intoxicating beverages, was amended by the last legislature to say plainly, "Every wife, child, parent, guardian, husband, or other person, who shall be injured in person or property or means of support by any intoxicated person, or by reason of the selling, giving, or by reason of the intoxication of any person, fermented, or malt liquors to any person shall have a right of action in his or her own name against any person or persons who shall, by selling or giving any intoxicating or malt liquors, have caused or contributed to such injury, and the principal and sureties to the bond hereinbefore mentioned shall be liable severally and jointly with the person so selling," etc., etc.

* * * * * *

Now that there is a chance for recovery of both actual and exemplary damages (see revised statutes) will not parties injured be more energetic in demanding restitution? We especially ask wives to notice that all their interests and interest of children in property so pledged to the liquor traffic is jeopardized beyond dower-right and homestead reserve.

By Order of W. C. T. U.

SOUTHERN GLEANINGS.

BY MRS. GEORGIA HULSE MCLEOD.

"Some find work where some find rest,
And so the weary world goes on;
I sometimes wonder why it is,
The answer comes when life is gone.
Some hands fold where other hands
Are lifted bravely in the strife;
And so through ages and through lands
Move on the two extremes of life."

Maryland.—The Baltimore W. C. T. U. celebrated its tenth annual meeting in Y. M. C. A. hall on April 8. Mrs. Dr. Thomas, who is also president of the state union, and the old officers were re-elected. The membership of the union is 195. Its work extends all over the city. Encouraging reports were made by superintendents of departments of temperance literature, on the use of fermented wine at the communion table, scientific temperance instruction in the public schools, and on the encouragement of kitchen gardens. The treasurer's report showed that $920.10 had been expended during the year.

North Carolina.—The annual meeting of Greensboro W. C. Temperance Union is reported as having been well attended and of unusual interest. Mrs. E. D. Hundley (scarcely convalescent) presided in the absence of the president. A very delightful address was made by Mrs. Woody wife of Prof. Woody of New Garden College. The accession of this new worker is recorded as a cause for congratulation as well as the addition of new and influential members.

Several superintendents of departments were appointed, among these one for Sunday school work, and for work among the colored people.

New unions have been formed at Winston, Kernersville, Morganton and Statesville, all important points.

The note of preparation has been sounded, and good results hoped for in the coming of Mrs. Sallie F. Chapin, of Charleston, and Miss Henrietta G. Moore of Ohio.

Texas.—Broad as its extensive acres are the charities of the workers of the Lone Star state. Earnest, persistent and hopeful as our Liege Lady could desire are the efforts of the brave officers of the W. C. T. Union. If they reap what they sow, precious and golden will the harvest be. Says an editor of a prominent journal, writing to a friend of the cause, "I am rejoiced to hear of the success of the W. C. T. U. in our broad state. Never before did the temperance question so agitate all classes of our society as it does today. God grant we may be able to hold every point we have gained and may our victorious host press onward until in every city, town and hamlet in Texas, a recruiting station shall be established where young soldiers shall be enlisted and trained for the temperance army." And the women of the W. C. T. U. fervently respond "Amen and amen!"

Mrs. Beauchamp who is winning laurels as a speaker, is working faithfully through this state, of which she is president. She has lately organized flourishing unions at Cleburne and Maxahachie. Mrs. Lizzie Johnson of Paris, who has been active in prison work, has received as a donation from the American Tract Society, thirty pounds of the very best literature. This was suggested to them by the testimony of a prisoner for whose soul she had cared.

Miss Henrietta G. Moore of Ohio, is speaking and organizing very successfully in the state. "The people," says the corresponding secretary, "are delighted with her, and we feel that her work will greatly strengthen the cause."

The press notices of her addresses at Blossom Prairie and at Bonham are very gratifying. The Gazette says: "She is a fine speaker, with great command of language. She spoke for more than an hour and held her hearers spellbound and they could not but be convinced that she is enlisted in a cause which is gaining ground and becoming more popular every day."

South Carolina.—Mrs. Chapin is working to purpose in her own state, and the press notices are, without exception, most favorable to her and the cause she represents. From the Laurensville Herald I give a brief extract, not having space for a full report:

"The largest audience we have seen for a long time assembled on Wednesday night in the court house to hear Mrs. Sallie F. Chapin, of Charleston, who was invited here by the ladies of the place to deliver a lecture in the interest of 'The Woman's Christian Temperance Union.' We have never heard a more forcible, practical, eloquent, and at times pathetic appeal than she made on Wednesday night."

At the close of the lecture lists were carried through the audience and one hundred and eight names were obtained, forty-seven of whom were ladies. Mrs. Chapin organized a union of which M. Y. Garlington was elected president. Eighteen additional names were given making a total of 126. Good beginning for the new and welcome W. C. T. U.

South Carolina.—The workers here fully realize the power of the press. I have the privilege of reading The Temperance Worker, of which Mrs. Chapin is an editor, and I find from its columns that all united temperance forces are daily and hourly at work in the contest. May the workers and the work soon be crowned with victory!

The Carolina Spartan in a late issue gives an account of the annual meeting of the W. C. T. U. of Spartanburg and able address of the president, wife of Hon. W. K. Blake, who alluded to the morning three years ago, when Miss Willard came among them on her blessed mission. I wonder if Miss Willard remembers that morning when a D. D. rekindled the waning embers in her honor, while she kindled a fire in the hearts of the loving women there gathered, which is still sending out light and warmth wherever they are working. This W. C. T. U. has a column in the South Carolina Spartan, and I find by the announcement of their meetings, headed by those of Y. W. C. T. U., that these are held regularly and with encouraging success every Thursday.

Tennessee.—The wide awake W. C. T. U. are on their watchtower, and from one of the sisterhood I glean that, "Fifty distilleries are in the Nashville, Tenn., revenue district. What a volume of ruin in store for the people! Could this ocean stream of whisky be tracked in its work and a history be written in the damage it will do to society, the heart would be appalled at the recital."

Doubtless, but the W. C. T. U. are on the track, and are sending out their life boats as well, to rescue from the flood and stem the tide of evil.

Mrs. Harrison is much encouraged to find that a state organizer has been secured from whose efforts she hopes much good will result. The lady is from Memphis, and highly spoken of.

A card.—May I ask my sister gleaners of southern states to send me their helpful grains, so that I may receive them on Tuesday of each week. I send my budget to The Union Signal on Wednesday and unless my letters come earlier the news must be left over another week.

INDIANA.

The W. C. T. U. of Indiana will hold its annual state convention at Seymour, May 28, 29 and 30. The executive committee will meet at the same place, on the 27. The National president will attend the convention.

The Young Woman's Christian Temperance Union, of Indianapolis, some time ago changed its name to Young People's Christian Temperance Union, and amended its constitution so as to admit young gentlemen on the same footing as young ladies. Whether orthodox or not the change has worked well.

The Y. P. C. T. U. No. 2 has recently been organized in the southwestern part of the city with Mr. A. H. Hutchinson as president.

They have formed a Band of Hope and expect to make that their special work.

FLOWER MISSION WORK.

My beloved co-workers in Flower Mission branch of W. C. T. U.: Mrs. Willard has kindly consented to give us a column in our National paper, "The Union Signal, and we will be able to talk with each other every week. This brings me very near to each of you, and I hope the department will make our column an attractive feature of the paper. We ought to be able to do so, for out of such a beautiful ministry ought to come beautiful results. Having secured this excellent medium for an interchange of our hopes, encouragements and especially our plans and results. I earnestly hope all interested in this branch of service for the Master may feel it a necessity to subscribe for The Union Signal. No one of us who desires or expects to keep posted at every point can afford to do without it.

I come today to talk with you about the text cards to be used in our work. I had hoped to have this matter settled several weeks ago, but from various causes I have been prevented hitherto. My first plan was to have our literature department get up the cards for us and so keep our money in our own work. I wrote to Miss Colman on this subject. She answered very kindly and promptly, but I have waited until I could give you definite information before writing anything further to you. Miss C. devotes all her efforts and her means to strictly temperance work, and as my cards are not to have what could be called temperance texts on them she feels it would be neither wise nor practicable for her to undertake to publish them for us. She justly thinks as she is not a general publisher, is not pursuing the temperance publishing to make money at it, she cannot come into competition with general dealers in cards; viz., the Sunday school men who have a large custom already, and could use these cards in their Sunday school work. She says, "It would cost just as much to make the plates for the one hundred texts you have selected if I was going to strike off one thousand impressions (making 150 000 cards) as if I was going to strike off one hundred times as many, as the Sunday school publishers probably do. And as the cost of plates would in each case be added to that of the card-board and printing, it would make a very material difference." As these are not texts she uses for temperance texts you can readily see she would lose money by it.

After carefully considering the whole subject, I have decided to have them published right here in my own city, and under my personal supervision, so ensuring a judicious selection and thereby relieving me of any anxiety in regard to their appropriations, and curtailing the amount of my writing to a great extent.

If each of the state superintendents will send to the W. C. T. U. here in Louisville, for the text cards, it will be a great advantage to me for I have made arrangements with one of our wide awake business men, who is a staunch friend of the temperance cause, to let me have them by the thousand at such rates that I can afford to let the whole department have them cheaper than they can be bought at any retail store, and still leave me a little surplus which I can devote to the national work. This will be a great good for me as you all know how much it hampers our beloved work to have no fund upon which to draw for needed supplies.

I consider the wise selection of texts to be used in our work the feature of this department, and it is for this reason I wish to select them and oversee the sending them out to the different states. Our aim is to lead souls up to Christ, and this leads them up to temperance, and on the only sure foundation. You all realize what a judicious selection of God's words may mean, and how easy it would be to arouse prejudice and antagonize good feelings, and this is why I oppose the use of temperance texts and lay so much stress upon the kind to be distributed. For instance, suppose you go to one burdened with care and sin, but who loves his beer, or one whose taste is perverted by strong drink, and give him, or her, a boquet with such a text as this, "Wine is a mocker, strong drink is raging," or "Whose mouth is full of cursing and bitterness," "Their feet are swift to shed blood," or "Nor thieves, nor covetous man, nor drunkard, shall inherit the kingdom of God." What will be the result? He will tear the card right in two, will be insulted, or will feel you are displaying a reproachful, selfrighteous, spirit; and there is an end of all your influence over that soul. But suppose the eye fall at once upon these words: "Cast thy burden on the Lord and He shall sustain thee," or "Come unto Me all ye that labor and are heavy laden and I will give you rest," or, "Surely He hath borne our griefs and carried our sorrows;" you bring him a balm for his wounded heart, you teach of the Great Burden Bearer, and open the way for other visits, and further sweet influences. Flowers are such tender reminders of God's love they should always be accompanied by a loving promise, or a pleading invitation from the Savior's lips.

The superintendents can get text cards at $1.25 per thousand by sending to Miss Gertrude Ferguson, W. C. T. U. room, No. 2, Polytechnic Building, Fourth ave., Louisville, Ky. I have had these small plain cards gotten up because I think we ought not to afford anything more expensive for our weekly, general work. Each superintendent can decide for herself as to the propriety of using the floral text cards for prison day work. I think handsomer ones would be more acceptable for that day if they can be afforded. Would it not be well for each state superintendent to try to ascertain the number of cards needed for the month or quarter, and order all at once? If it is more convenient to order direct from us than from the superintendent of your state we will gladly serve you.

Very sincerely your faithful friend,

Jennie Casseday.

OFFICIAL COMMUNICATIONS.

ABOUT THE MEMORIALS AND VOTER'S PLEDGE.

To the Local Unions:

Questions are coming in relative to the memorials. In reply we would say that it seems best to send them to congress after the presidential election. Before that time they would attract very little attention, being signed only representatively.

The voter's pledge is for the education and crystallizing of sentiment, and the recruiting of a majority committee to the proposition, "The saloon must go." We suggest that these pledges with all names secured be pasted into scrap books and kept among the archives of each local union.

In circulating the voter's pledge, it is desirable to pay especial attention to young voters, and to get the pledge of youths soon to become such. The home has everything to hope from the ballots of the boys who have been trained in Sunday schools and Bands of Hope during the last ten years. The voter's pledge, bearing our National seal, will be sent FREE to all applicants. Address the corresponding secretary.

We hope for renewed effort on the part of our friends during the next two months to increase the circulation and influence of The Union Signal. We believe that it only needs to be known to be appreciated, and with this idea have resolved to issue TRIAL SUBSCRIPTIONS of one month for only ten cents each. We suggest that each local union or individual subscriber feeling inclined to work for us in this way send us a list of all members of the W. C. T. U. and others of their acquaintance who are not at present subscribers to the paper, together with ten cents for each name, and we will send them the paper for one month, and also write each person informing them that the paper has been sent and paid for by friends who desire them to become permanent subscribers. A large proprotion of the names thus received would certainly become regular subscribers, and as such evince far more interest in W. C. T. U. work than ever before. If it is impossible to send us payment for these short term subscriptions, send us the names and we will at least send one sample copy to each relying upon the friends sending the names to call afterward upon the parties and personally solicit their subscriptions.

We must run up the circulation of this paper to twenty-five thousand copies. For an organization such as we represent this number is a small one and it can be easily reached if every friend of the paper would just devote a little thought, time and attention to it. Help us friends just now, and let us see the literary exponent of the most influential body of women in the world, take its deserved place in the front rank of American journalism.

The wonderful address on "The Delusion of High License" by Rev. Herrick Johnson, D.D., which created much excitement on its delivery before the Temperance Conference in Chicago and which has been the subject of so much criticism in newspaper circles, should be widely circulated in every community. There has been nothing like it written upon the subject. It cannot fail to make temperance sentiment wherever read. It can be obtained at this office in convenient form for distribution at the low price of 30cts PER HUNDRED POSTPAID. Every Local Union should distribute at least 1,000 copies. Persons who have ordered it for their community report to us that they are astounded at the good results. Begin without delay.

Surface Indications

What a miner would very properly term "surface indications" of what is beneath, are the Pimples, Sties, Sore Eyes, Boils, and Cutaneous Eruptions with which people are annoyed in spring and early summer. The effete matter accumulated during the winter months, now makes its presence felt, through Nature's endeavors to expel it from the system. While it remains, it is a poison that festers in the blood and may develop into Scrofula. This condition causes derangement of the digestive and assimilatory organs, with a feeling of enervation, languor, and weariness—often lightly spoken of as "only spring fever." These are evidences that Nature is not able, unaided, to throw off the corrupt atoms which weaken the vital forces. To regain health, Nature must be aided by a thorough blood-purifying medicine; and nothing else is so effective as

Ayer's Sarsaparilla,

which is sufficiently powerful to expel from the system even the taint of Hereditary Scrofula.

The medical profession indorse Ayer's Sarsaparilla, and many attestations of the cures effected by it come from all parts of the world. It is, in the language of the Hon. Francis Jewett, ex-State Senator of Massachusetts and ex-Mayor of Lowell, "the only preparation that does real, lasting good."

BRAIN AND NERVE FOOD.

VITALIZED PHOSPHITES.—Restores the energy lost by nervousness, weakness or indigestion; relieves lassitude and neuralgia; refreshes the nerves tired by worry, excitement or excessive sensitiveness, and strengthens a failing memory. It aids wonderfully in the mental and bodily growth of infants and children. Under its use the teeth come easier, the bones grow better, the skin smoother, the brain acquires more readily and rests and sleeps more sweetly. An ill fed brain learns no lessons, and is excusable if peevish. It gives a more intellectual and happier childhood. It does away with that feeling of weakness and exhaustion which impels to the use of alcoholic beverages, and directly counteracts a cause of depravity and suffering which has baffled the efforts of religion and morality. ## Signal Notes.

The Heredity Institute organized in March in connection with the Cheney, Washington Territory, W. C. T. U. by Dr. Mary H. Whitney bids fair to step near the first ranks in this department.

Senator Anthony attributes his recent very severe illness to the smoking of cigaretts. It is a wise man that can climb over the barrier of a favorite indulgence to discover the enemy lurking on the other side.

Miss Franes E. Willard visited Fitchburg on Sunday April 13 under the auspices of the W. C. T. U. and addressed a large audience in the city hall at 3. p. m. At 5 o'clock she spoke at a railroad mass meeting in L. J. Brown's hall.

About the strangest temperance lecture of the season, is the recent statement of the keeper of the New York Morgue, that four fifths of the five thousand bodies that reached the city dead house there every year, are sent there by drunkenness.

A distinguished clergyman in one of our eastern cities, was met by a dilapidated looking individual, with a flask of whisky in his pocket, who inquired: "Sir, is this the nearest road to the alms-house?" "No, sir," replied the clergyman pointing to the bottle, "but that is."

The women of Ellenville, N. Y. quietly informed the business men, that all who voted in favor of license would lose their trade. It is needless to say that prohibition won by a grand majority. It thus seems that boycotting can be effectually done by prohibitionists, as well as by the saloon party.—The Prohibitionist.

On Taursday March 20, the Hon. Neal Dow, of Maine, reached his eightieth birthday. His extraordinary physical and mental vigor at this advanced age affords a conspicuous exemplification of the benefits of total abstinence. May he live to see the now rapidly-approaching triumph of prohibition in national politics.—N. Y. Witness.

Any person desiring to place money on first mortgages secured by real estate, or to make investments in choice farming lands or growing western towns will do well to correspond with Jas. C. Young of Cedar Rapids, Iowa. Mr. Young is thoroughly reliable, and our friends need have no hesitancy in consulting him with reference to any financial transaction they may wish to make.

An inspector in Halton, Ontario, entered a suspected hotel with a search-warrant. As he went in unannounced there was the sound of a stampede, and he followed hard upon the footsteps of the retreating host. Disappointed at not seeing his man when he reached the bedroom, the officer burrowed among the bed clothes that seemed to have been recently disturbed. Between the ticks he found a quantity of liquor, and further explorations of the chamber revealed the fugitive hiding in a closet. The hotel-keeper appeared before the police magistrate, and confessed to "keeping for sale" intoxicating liquor, and was fined $100 and $20 costs. That is the way the Scott act (local option) is proving a failure in Halton.

TO OUR READERS.

We append the testimony of Gen. C. H. Howard, because of the esteem and confidence in which he is held, not only by his many friends, but also by the thousands who know him as the recent editor of the Advance, and hence know that only deserved merit alone can influence him in the following statement:

Chicago, Ill., March 4, 1884.

Dr. F. L. Peiko—Dear Sir: It gives me great pleasure to state that Mrs. Howard's health is permanently restored. Last summer she began the use of your excellent Oxygen treatment by your advice So gratifying have been the results that it seems to be not less than a simple duty, as a debt of gratitude, to make this statement. Very respectfully yours,

C. H. Howard.

The Salvation Army has just lost $100,000 in the failure of the lease of the Grecian theater for which it paid the above amount. It was found that a clause had been inserted in the lease requiring the lessee to maintain the bar of the theater and continue the open sale of alcoholic beverages. General Booth was held by the owner with Satanic purpose, to the strict "nomination of the bond," which of course he could not and would not meet, and the court declared the lease forfeited, with all the amounts paid thereon. What could fiendish ingenuity suggest more like itself and the pit from which it springs?

Miscellaneous Selections.

A fund of $5,000 is being raised by English temperance people for Edward Payson Weston who walked 5,000 miles for total abstinence, and at financial loss to himself.

The alumni of the Philadelphia College of Pharmacy has condemned the sale of "intoxicating liquors as a beverage in drug stores as a growing evil tending to degrade the profession of Pharmacy, and damage the morals of the community."

The Emperor of China recently authorized the destruction of four million dollars worth of opium, and absolutely refuses to accept a revenue from its sale. A few such heathen officials are needed in the United States to deal with the whisky traffic.

Temperance is rapidly working its way into all forms of business. One of the latest "straws" is the following pledge required by a gentleman renting a farm. "I also agree to give my crop to him if I become intoxicated, while I live on his premises."

There are two men in Chicago who ought to be held up for setting an example worthy of imitation. These men are painters, the Schoenberger Bros., who advertise on their business cards, stationery, etc., that they will paint neither saloon nor tobacco signs.

The first Baptist church of Benton, Ill., has taken the only position a Christian church can consistently take in ruling that persons who vote for saloons or who publicly advocate them, or who invest money in them, or who suffer their property used for them in any way, cannot be continued as members of their body.

Before publishing his book, "Study and Stimulants," Mr. A. Arthur Reade sent circulars to a large number of literary men, asking about their habits with respect to the use of alcohol, tobacco, etc., while engaged in literary work. He says that no one of the 162 who replied to his questions resort to alcohol for inspiration. Thirty-four abstained wholly from its use.

The leaven of temperance is at work in Kentucky, one of the states most extensively engaged in the manufacture of whisky. In the absence of any general law regulating the sale of intoxicating liquor, the whole state is being covered over with what are called sumptuary laws, calculated to meet the demands of certain localities. Already the list shows the passage by the legislature of no less than twenty-four bills, with titles like the following: House bill to prevent the sale of liquor in Garrard county under any circumstances.

These patterns can be instantly transferred to any material, and can be used a hundred times over.

The Union Signal

OFFICIAL ORGAN OF THE WOMAN'S NATIONAL CHRISTIAN TEMPERANCE UNION.

"Thou hast given a banner to them that fear Thee; that it may be displayed because of the Truth; that Thy beloved may be delivered."

VOL. X.—NO. 18. CHICAGO, MAY 1, 1884. $1 75 PER YEAR.

THE Regular Quarterly meeting of the Directors of the Woman's Temperance Publication Association will be held at Hawthorne, Elmhurst, Illinois, Wednesday, May 7, 1884, commencing at 10 o'clock A. M. MARY ALLEN WEST,
Secretary W. T. P. A.

THE place and time of the prohibition home-protection party convention, is now settled at Pittsburg, Penn., for the 23d of July.

PROHIBITION has been again defeated in the New York legislature and by the same close vote. A few weeks ago the vote stood 63 against, to 61 for the amendment. Tuesday's vote is 63 to 60.

"THE Philosophy of the Temperance Reform" is the title of a stout (in more senses than one) pamphlet, by the Rev. D. C. Babcock, of the National Temperance Society. It is comprehensive and timely.

THREE cheers for Rhode Island,—petite, plucky and persistent! Without petitions or the pressure of persuasive public pleading, the legislature has passed the compulsory scientific temperance instruction bill. This action gives us five states arrayed against the next generation of saloons. It is as good as a ten year's note for prohibition.

MR. FRANCIS MURPHY is this week to begin an active campaign in this city under the auspices of the West Side W. C. T. U. His labors in Freeport, jointly with those of his son, have resulted in 2500 pledges. Mr. Murphy, it is said, has become a prohibitionist, but believes still in the moral suasion side of prohibition, as do we all.

NOTHING has done such execution in a still, small, insinuating way as the American adaptation of Mr. Hoyle's little chart showing the relative expenditures of the country. It has been printed in black lines in a large number of newspapers, and now is given in large sheet form at ten cents per copy by Rev. J. L. Dyas, of Sandwich, Illinois. It is an excellent device for posting and placarding temperance truth.

SALOON legislation often overreaches. In the days of prohibition in the city of Monmouth in this state, it was a matter of complaint that liquor was sold by the bottle and such sale protected by state law, and so occasion was given for the usual cry "Prohibition does not prohibit." As soon as the $1000 license came into effect, the saloons desired protection against the "bottle system" and at once secured a stringent ordinance prohibiting it. Now high license has been succeeded by prohibition and the would-be saloonist gnash their teeth with rage at the strong cords with which they have bound themselves.

IT seems to be the case that in some localities the announcement of the general officers of the N. W. C. T. U. that the great W. C. T. U. petition to political parties and congress had been abandoned, is not yet understood, and its circulation is needlessly going on. Doubtless the supplement to THE UNION SIGNAL in which this explanation was made, has escaped notice, or if seen, made indistinct impression. Once more then, the memorial petition has been abandoned.

THE eleventh annual meeting of the Maryland Temperance Alliance showed most encouraging progress in that state. Over six hundred delegates were present, representing more than half the counties in the state. Over half the territory is now under local prohibitory law, which is well enforced.

Col. Geo. W. Bain, Mrs. Mary A. Woodbridge, Prof. A. Hopkins of the American Reformer, and the English visitors, Mr. Barker and Mr. Hoyle, of the United Kingdom Temperance Alliance, added to the interest of the occasion by speeches, impromptu and otherwise. During the exercises a two thousand dollar collection was taken up. President William Daniel has every reason for the good cheer with which he urges on the work in Maryland.

THE resolutions adopted by this convention include one which seems a little "difficult"—in that it bids all women in the land "to remember that as the home is the foundation of the nation, and she is the maker of the home, so we call upon her to save the nation by saving her sacred home from the indescribably horrible curse of intemperance." We do not believe these good Marylanders mean to impose on us the task of the ancient Egyptians, and such a call looks very like the command to make bricks without straw.

SPEAKING of home, there is a cry that comes to us often. It is the cry of the home not only against the saloon, but against the saloon patron. And when we think of it, is there really any justification possible for the home builder who deliberately tears down its walls and sets them tumbling upon the helpless inmates?

Let us have the other side of the appeal rung out over the world; not only the home against the saloon, but the home against the drinker.

CALIFORNIA sets us many a good example, none better however than one furnished by the Sunday school of the Central M. E. church of San Francisco. This school makes its regular quarterly temperance Sunday as much of an "occasion" as Christmas or Easter. A prettily arranged program covers a chapter of Miss Colman's Christian Temperance Catechism, and is given with a temperance leaflet containing valuable information to each member of the congregation at the close of the morning service. This brings out a large audience for the afternoon school service and scatters large measure of the truth. The originator of the plan is Mr. William Abbot, the live superintendent of what must inevitably be a live school, and who says: "I believe all our Sunday schools should be active, lively temperance societies."

A NEW Saul of Tarsus is Lars Olsen Smith, the former brandy king of Sweden, now, that country's most energetic temperance reformer. The Pall Mall Gazette gives a long account of his operations, showing that he is no idealist or Utopian schemer, but his plans for the betterment of his own and all people reach down about the roots of the drink evil. Better food, better cooking, better dwellings are in his thought for the poor, and at this time he has agents scattered over the continent of Europe studying every social experiment for their amelioration. It would be interesting to know just how the light broke around him in the very opposite career of his earlier years, just how and where the scales fell from his eyes and the new purpose was born in his heart.

IN many localities the W. C. T. U. is fighting a good fight against immoral and debasing literature. The Police Gazette and News, together with the "blood and thunder" novels and newspapers are among the objects of its successful attack. One brave W. C. T. U. woman, a national superintendent by the way, in passing the shop of a news dealer, saw very objectionable photographs displayed in his window. She walked inside and asked the price of each. The dealer responded with a rather surprised air and when asked if these were all his stock brought out a quantity like unto them. The lady said quietly, "I will take them all," and paying their price took them in hand, tore each one into bits and left the astonished seller to sweep out the rubbish at his leisure, saying as she left, "O, if I could only tear up every such representation." So say we all of us.

KING ALCOHOL'S SOLILOQUY.

BY HARRIET A. SAWYER.

In the broad light of day my grim visage I hide
Nor out in my uniform once dare I ride,
For 'tis red with the blood of the victims I've slain,
And it spangles with tears like the dew on the main.
That a victor I am there is none to deny,
For who rules and ruins so many as I?
War and famine their millions in dust have laid low,
But of all that is holy am I the arch foe.
See my army move on! none can with it compare.
Though they fall by the myriads—why should I care?
For recruits always ready come pressing along,
How I gloat o'er their revelry, joy in their song!
I am not content with aught save the best,
My recruits must be generous—their all must invest
But a single draught—and I count them mine,
On my black-list enroll them, ere the truth they divine.
Out of the specie that falls in the till,
I forge chains to make them the slaves of my will.
The king on his throne and the prince in the hall
Pay homage and bow before King Alcohol.
In dungeons the prisoners have pined and have died
But their spirits were free and all bondage defied;
But my chains bind in manhood the God-given will,
Though they long to be free they are prisoners still.
Press closely, O! mother, your boy to your breast,
Though your arms may be weary, your heart now may rest.
Press again to your lips those tiny pink feet,
For I'll cause them to fail and to fall in the street.
Listen! How with sweet accent he now lisps thy name;—
I will teach him his Maker's and thine to defame.
I'll await him in banquet, in home and in hall:
That beautiful boy, by my oath he shall fall!
I hear the uprising of men o'er the land,
Against my dominions—a host they command.
But at all legislators and "legions" I laugh
While with my battalion my poison I quaff.
But there is one name—I must whisper it low,
'Tis humanity's refuge, but my dreaded foe.
That name—I can't speak it—I'll try to forget,
Drink again, O! my boys, ere the stars all are set.
I have lost from my force some I thought were my own.
As they looked and were saved by the Crucified One.
Then rouse ye my children, find joy in the bowl,
Ye must not grow tender nor think of the soul.
When the tongue cries for liquor, let no prayer be said,
Though the children are crying and praying for bread.
If the thought of a mother, wife, sister or child
Mingles pain with the draught, let your mirth grow more wild.
Drink again! O my boys—and again, one and all—
For you are my slaves,—I am King Alcohol.

FOR BETTER, FOR WORSE.

BY JANE EGGLESTON ZIMMERMAN.

Well, now Caleb's gone, it does seem as ef Mis' Harding ought to take a mite o' comfort," observed her neighbor, John Bisbee, as he drew up to the stove after supper, the day Caleb Harding had been consigned to a drunkard's grave.

"That boy o' hers," he continued, is a powerful stiddy boy. Ef he don't turn out well, then I miss my guess. No more like his father than chalk's like cheese."

"I calk'late ef ever a boy saw the folly of it, Nat Harding has," observed Mrs. Bisbee as she passed to and fro, clearing up the supper things. "But then, he's got the Harding blood, an' I never saw one o' that branch o' the family since I can remember, that didn't take to liquor as nat'rally as a duck takes to water," she added, shaking her head.

"Pshaw! now, mother, don't send the boy to perdition afore he even makes a start for it. What's to make him take to drink, I want to know? He's got to clear that farm o' mortgage, or see his mother turned out o' doors, all on account o' drink."

"Well, well, let's hope for the best, father, and not say nothing to discourage the boy. His load's heavy enough, as 'tis," and Mrs. Bisbee sighed as she settled herself beside her John with her knitting.

When Nathaniel Harding, young, strong, hopeful, became aware of the condition of his mother's business, her farm burdened with a heavy mortgage, which threatened speedily to swallow up the little property, he decided to try the experiment so often tried, of seeking business in the west.

As usual, this enterprising move was discussed far and wide by those who had known the Hardings from generation to generation. Some approved, others disapproved, and still others shook their heads, not liking to commit themselves until the wisdom or unwisdom of the move had been proven.

The separation from her only child, after her recent bitter trials, was a heavy blow to the widow, but she had a brave heart for her fate.

"Nathan's so stiddy, I do set store by that," she said to those with whom she talked. "He's never given me a single heart ache, not the least mite, since he was born. I couldn't feel willin', no way, ef he was wild, but as he's got restless now, I guess the best thing's to let him go. 'T won't be like home, Chicago won't, an' mebbe he'll come back sooner'n he calk'lates to."

The widow Harding never spoke a truer word than when she remarked that Chicago wouldn't be "like home" to her boy.

He landed in the great city in the afternoon of a rainy, dismal day in the early spring, with fifteen dollars in his pocket, a better equipment than many a now merchant prince found himself possessed of, on his first arrival.

As he looked about him, bewildered, at the railway station, a young man, not much older than himself accosted him pleasantly.

"Blundering big thing, ain't it?" he asked, sauntering up to where Nathaniel stood, with the easy air of one "to the manner born," which easy air Nathaniel could not help envying.

"What?" asked Nathaniel. "Chicago," answered his companion. I'll swear you can just see it grow every day. Acquainted much in the city?"

"Don't know anyone," answered Nathaniel, with a sudden sinking of the heart.

"O well, you shan't say that long," answered the other, heartily. You must see the sights, if you've never been here before. I'll go round with you, tonight, and show you what Chicago's like. Where are you going to stop?"

"O I intend to hunt up some reasonable boarding house," answered Nathaniel.

"Well my friend, Mack McGregor's is just the place you want, good board and the cheapest in the city. Come along, I'll show you, and after supper we'll take a squint at the elephant."

Nathaniel Harding was nineteen years old, but he had never been in a great city before. A few trips to Bangor, where he had relatives with whom he staid, and acquaintances in the grocery trade, with whom he dealt, had been the extent of his worldly experience outside his own country town of Boothby. He had never been in the habit of reading a daily paper, or he must instantly have recognized his new acquaintance as belonging to the order of being known as confidence men.

The boarding house was both dull and dreary. A place more unlike his mother's homely, but exquisitely neat house, where the whole atmosphere was that of a home, it would be hard to find. The contrast was like that between Paradise and Tophet. The little seven by nine room which contained his trunk was inexpressibly wearisome. What better could he do, than accept the invitation of his new acquaintance, and see the sights of the great city?

If the Young Men's Christian Association could have got in a runner for their attractions before the gamblers got in theirs, this story had not been told, but these good people had no runners. If the Woman's Christian Association had had their runners at the different railway stations, experienced, motherly women, many a tale of woe and wrong would be unknown, because unhappened. But this, the ounce of prevention, had not then been inaugurated.

By the time Nathaniel Harding had secured a position in a business house, the pool room had whiled away many an unoccupied evening which, otherwise, had been intolerably dull and lonely. By the time he had become an expert at faro, he had passed from beer, to one, and then two "fingers" of old rye. He was amazed at the craving he found within himself.

"O well, I must 'pull up,' this will never do," he said to himself. But his first essay at gambling had been, to him, surprisingly successful, and the ease with which he had doubled his money, made him long to double it a few times more, when the money for the mortgage would be his, and he would go back to his mother and Prue. For he had left his heart behind him, in old slow going Boothby, and the din and sin of the great city had not yet effaced the young pure love of his heart.

"I can't play faro, without 'bracing up' that's sure," he would say. "I'll stop the drink when I stop the play. I must make up my pile first though."

His fortune, however, had begun to turn somewhat. His losses now balanced, nay, sometimes outweighed his gains. Feeling the smart of this, he redoubled his energies, and his drinking, in order to regain what he had lost. The Harding blood began to tell in the eager drunkard. Chicago was not like home, and no more was Nat Harding like the son his mother had lost. For she and Prue rarely had a letter now. The mother, long used to a burden of woe, sighed and prayed and hoped. "Natie's so steddy, I can't think he's wrong. I'm only afraid he's sick."

Having become a fit subject for the labors of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union, he at last finds his way into a gospel temperance meeting. The scourge of scorpions which he has knotted for himself has become intolerable, and he would be glad to purchase relief at any price. At any price? Ah! there is one price, and only one, demanded for this relief, and this price he will not pay. He contents himself with being sorry he is a drunkard, wishing he were not, asking prayers, and he goes out as he came in.

Two years go by, in alternate debauch and repentance. Nathaniel Harding is twenty-one, and a common drunkard. He writes to his mother and Prue, in his sober intervals, but he never hints to them the real state of affairs. And his mother sews and knits, and makes carpet rags and butter, and pays the interest on the mortgage herself. Nathanial never mentions it. And Prue stays half her time with the mother of her lover, regardless of propriety, and of the lectures she receives from the well behaved.

"Heard from Nathaniel lately?" asked John Bisbee, as he passes through the door yard to the widow's field beyond. He has done all her plowing since Nathaniel went away.

"Not very," answers Mrs. Harding, hesitating. She does not know exactly why she dreads to have her boy's name mentioned now.

"He had just gone into a new place, when he wrote last, an' I don't doubt but he's desprit busy. Natie always was a worker you know."

"O yes, I'll risk him," answers John Bisbee, with more confidence than he really feels. He knows, well enough, in the friendly spying which life long neighbors deem no harm, that Nathaniel Harding has not written to mother or sweetheart for months. John Bisbee goes on to the "hill pasture," and the mother, on whom whisky has heaped such bitter woe, goes in to her work, to pray for her boy, although she knows not what to pray for. She ends with praying with an exceeding great and bitter cry, that it may be well with her only child. And it shall be well. A faithful mother's prayers have been the life boat which has saved many a shipwrecked soul.

One day Nat Harding came into the gospel meeting, which he attended faithfully after every drinking spell. This time, he seemed, to the one who had tried to help him, to be more than usually dejected.

"You see," he explained, "I have been drinking again."

"But why did you drink again?" asked his friend, who had witnessed his repentance and anguish many times. How is it you do not pray for deliverance when the temptation comes?"

'Well, you see, it is just this way," answered Nathaniel, giving what is the experience of many a drunkard. "When I see a flask of whisky and they're awfully common in Chicago, everything else becomes a blank, I can't think of anything else but just that; I never once think of prayer; I don't know there is such a thing; I don't know there's a God; I don't know anything but just that I want whisky. Then I turn into the first saloon I come to; there's always one handy. 'Twouldn't be so down in Maine, and when I've had one glass, then I want a barrelful, and that's the way it happens. I don't see as it can be helped," with a sigh.

"But this time," he continued, "I got into a worse scrape than usual. Going to jail is nothing to it."

"Why what is that?" asked his friend, with concern.

"Well, you see, I was on an awful long spree, two months ago, and I got married."

His friend looked inexpressibly shocked. She thought of the woe brought into another life, and also, which was some mitigation of the pity of it, that the woman who would marry a man in his cups, could not be worthy, or able to appreciate true wedded happiness.

"But married to an unworthy woman, will be his sure destruction," she thought, on further reflection.

But Nathaniel thought only of the disappointment his marriage would bring to Prue, oddly enough thinking himself worth mourning over.

"You see," he said, naively, Prue and I have kept company for four years now. And I promised faithfully I would come back and marry her. And now, I've spoiled the whole thing. I'm married, safe and sound to this other little thing. I wish you could see her, though. She's an awful pretty appearing young lady. She was waiting on table in the boarding house where I boarded. And I'm such a fool when I'm drunk, I never know what I'm doing, and before I knew what it was all about, we were married slick enough."

"When the nation shall have become sufficiently paternal to forbid marriage when either party to it is beside himself or herself with liquor, it will have done a wise thing, and such paternal oversight will be a blessing."

"It doesn't mend matters to sit down and groan over it," answered his friend. "Having done the poor girl the great wrong to link her fortunes with such as yours are at present," continued the lady, with hard, unrelenting common sense, "the best thing for you to do, is to stand by her, and forget Prue, as fast as you can."

"Forget Prue!" he asked, in astonishment. "I think it's an awful shame to jilt a girl that's waited for a man four years."

His friend did not tell him what a blessed deliverance it was for his jilted love, and he continued, with the natural selfishness of a young man.

"You see, I want to go back to Maine, when I make something, and I never can face Prue, after jilting her. It's an awful sell."

His friend was human. She longed to save this man, she shuddered over his ruin; her heart ached over his mother, (while she rejoiced over Prue). She asked him, however, the renowned and pitiless question: "What are you going to do about it?"

"That's a stumper!" he answered. I'll be shot if I know."

"When we sin," said his friend, "there are certain consequences of our sin, which no amount of forgiveness will remove. You sinned when you drank, you sinned when you married this hapless girl, (by a great forbearance she refrained from saying fearfully foolish girl). It is for you, now, to bear this consequence of your sin bravely, like a man. Being married, you must patiently take your fate as you have fashioned it, and live your life as well as is possible under existing circumstances. You have done this girl a great wrong. It is no blessing to be your wife unless you reform—(Nathaniel groaned), and you must be good and faithful to her. There is no other right way."

This was a hard lesson to be learned. The poor boy listened in silence. Perhaps he might be discouraged at the beginning, but the distinct facing of the problem at once was best.

Chicago is not a place where constitutional drunkards may easily reform. Nathaniel did not stop drinking except for short periods, and his friend next heard of him in the Bridewell on a charge of larceny while drunk.

She had the news on this wise:

A pretty and attractive looking young woman came to her after the meeting one day, begging her attention in a humble, shamefaced way.

"Please ma'am, I would like to speak to you about my husband. Harding's my name, ma'am."

"Are you Nathaniel Harding's wife?" asked the lady.

"Yes ma'am, at least that's what he calls himself, though I never could be quite sure that was his real name. I didn't know him very well when I married him."

"I should think not," thought her listener, with energy.

"Well ma'am, Nat, he's been drinkin', off an' on, this summer. I couldn't seem to stop him," (with tears of disappointment in her blue eyes.) "I thought when I married him, I'd be real good to him, an' make a pleasant little home for him. An' he seemed so fond of me I thought he'd reform, I did, indeed ma'am."

Her listener sighed.

"But there don't seem to be no sort of a chance for a man in Chicago," continued the young wife.

"There's saloons with nice looking bottles all piled up in 'em, most every step you take ma'am. At least I don't call 'em nice looking, myself, but they do seem an awful temptation to a man that loves liquor. When Nat was sent up, I first resolved I'd stick to him ma'am. He's awful kind and pleasant when he's sober. An' then, you see, we was married by a minister an' he put in, I remember the very words, 'For better, for worse,' an' that's the way I took my poor Nat an' I'm not goin' to give in, now it turns out to be worse instead o' better as I thought 'twas goin' to be."

The lady had this brave, faithful woman by the hand by this time, and her tears were flowing fast.

"I think you are right dear child, she said, as soon as she could command her voice. "If he is ever saved it must be through your faithfulness. Stand by him if you can stand it yourself."

"Yes, ma'am, that is what I mean to do," answered the wife, simply. I've took a little room close by the bridewell, an' I take in washin' and keep a tidy little place. I thought he would feel more encouraged if he had a sort of a little home to come to, when he is let out."

"He will, there's no sort of doubt of that," answered her friend. "For how long is his sentence?"

"Six months, ma'am, but two weeks of it is gone, already."

"You are a brave, good wife," said the lady. "Are you a Christian?"

"No ma'am," answered the woman, "I an't never made a profession, but I try to do what's right, an' I pray for Nat."

"Let her alone, she hath wrought a good work," said her friend to herself, thinking what a precious box of ointment this simple woman had poured forth. She was the one human chance of salvation for poor Nat, and she stood to her mission as bravely and unflinchingly as any hero the world has ever known. The little home, whose appointments were of the most meager kind, was kept always as bright and clean as a Chicago tenement can be made. Nat would appreciate this neatness more than any luxury. She was ready to meet and take him home, too, on the day he was free. The home shelter, the warm supper, the neatly blackened stove, were all appreciated by this son of a New England mother. Not a thing escaped him. He saw all, and he felt all it was meant for. For the moment, he forgot the jilted Prue waiting for him when he should have become rich and prosperous. His little simple minded wife deserved the best love of his heart and in time she would have it. Today he felt too much ashamed of himself, to fully appreciate her wifely devotion.

The next day they went to the gospel meeting. A new confession of sin, a fresh start in the upward path, were made. Nat takes heart of grace in hearing the confessions of other men. They have conquered through God's grace, why should not he? If God can save others why can He not save him? His little wife beams with hope and happiness. She prays with all her might. If a theologian had held her strictly to account, there might not have seemed to be much efficacy to her prayers, seeing she had not experienced a change herself, but she knows nothing of nice distinctions. She is one of those "little ones," like whom we must become, or ever we can inherit the kingdom.

After the meeting, Nat comes up to his friend, shamefacedly, but with hope beaming in his face.

"I am going to try hard to stand now, and I mean to ask God to help me," he said with emotion. 'Twould be easier down in Maine. I wouldn't have to see so much liquor; I could keep out of it there. O yes," with a sigh of longing, 't would be a great deal easier down to mother's, but I can't go back now."

"Why not?" asked his friend. "Well, you know I told you of the girl I'd been keepin' company with, down to East Boothby. I couldn't go back with Lucy, and face her you know."

His friend drew a letter from her pocket. It was one she had received, a few days before, from his mother. A part of it ran as follows:

"I don't know how ever I'll tell Nat. I expect it'll about kill him, but Prudence Higgins, the girl he was engaged to, has up and married Cap'n Lowell, an' gone with him to furrin' parts. Name a girl Prudence if ye want her to be as fickle as an April day. She promised to wait for Nat, an' now as soon as this Cap'n Lowell comes along, with more money than what Natie had, she deliberately throws Natie overboard, poor boy! an' goes off with this other man. Girls an't what they was in my day."

"What do you think of it?" asked his friend when he had finished reading the letter.

"I'll go back to mother's with Lucy now," he said, with a hopeful smile

A HEREDITY BIBLE READING.

BY DR. MAY HARRINGTON WHITNEY.

Psa. 66: 5. Prov. 16: 16. Eccl. 1: 13. Wisdom is estimated above rubies by both the Bible and profane history. Ere science unfolded her wealth of knowledge, the lives of ancient philosophers were devoted to studying nature's laws. It is our duty to follow their example, that our children may reap the benefit, as did theirs. Prov. 20: 21. Every cause must be followed by effect. Traits of character are formed by transitory parental emotions, and the end, who can tell? Deut. 4: 40. Prolonged life and a happy progeny is simply a natural process under obedience to God's commands. Deut. 5: 29. A wail comes from a soul that understands the waywardness of the human heart; a hopeless sound, isn't it? Deut. 28: 1 and 11. Rare blessings follow obedience to the higher laws. Imagination whispers of the standard of the nation on whom these blessings might fall. Noble and pure, possessing health, wealth and happiness. Num. 14: 18. Let us not forget our responsibility. Eccl. 1: 15. Jer. 31: 29. Hereditary transmission was recognized by the ancients. Psa. 58: 3. Born with the venom of wickedness upon them. Never to possess the loveliness of unsullied purity. Psa. 51: 5. Our minister compares the human character to a castle in which the animal nature forms the basement; the mental and moral nature are the first and second floors, the intellectual forms the fourth while the dome reaching high into heaven's own blue, or shrinking low, is the spiritual life, the capacity and utility of each room being determined by its architect, the inhabitant. Prov. 17: 6. Psa. 127: 3. The glory and reward is in our hands, and will be great or small, as we ourselves, shall limit it. God's plans for His children's happiness are continually overthrown by their sins. Psa. 132: 11–12. Josh. 14: 9. Psa. 45: 16–17. It has been predicted that America will fall as did Rome, but the Lord has "sworn in truth" that the children of the just shall sit upon His throne forever, and from the fact that history teaches that no nation flourishes as does the Christian nation, we believe that working through nature's laws, the fulfillment of these promises is sure, as the result of keeping the commands given us, and thus it rests in our hands to choose the destiny of our children. Isa. 65: 7. Rev. 2: 21–23. Parent and child suffer together, and the tribulations given as reward of our works, greatly exceeds the pleasures of sin. Deut. 28: 15 and 41. The greatest curse for disobedience is the burden of children in hereditary captivity to sin.

I am reminded forcibly of the story in THE UNION SIGNAL, of the good mother who bore with resignation and hopefulness, the heroic death of her son, while she contemplated with horror the possible development in him of his father's love for rum as the "worst possible thing that could happen to her." Eccl. 5: 3. For "his name shall be covered with darkness." Non-existence is preferable, for evil will not then be perpetuated. Prov. 30: 11. The heedless manner in which immortal souls are brought into being is worthy to be counted among the wonderful things so unaccountable to Solomon. Prov. 21: 17. Prov. 23: 20 and 29–35. The last two verses are an excellent description of the drunkard's experience which always has the sequel, "I will seek it yet again." Titus 1: 7. God countenances in no way sin and its results, and His servants and their children must be blameless. 1 Tim: 5: 8. In this quotation, I believe is included provisions spiritual, as well as temporal; the blame attached to negligence overbalances many virtues. Deut. 4: 9. Deut. 6: 6–7. The essential provision of moral and religious education becomes a greater work when the ante-natal training is neglected, so the warning is given in every case to take heed to ourselves, when the commands are in our own hearts, then shall we be fit to guide others to a higher appreciation of life. Psa. 78: 4–6 The knowledge is sweet and blessed that our Father continually has the children in His thoughts. How quickly should every mother catch and imitate the divine example, 1 Cor. 8: 8–13. 1 Cor. 9: 22. Paul recognized the fact of his responsibility, and deemed it no mean duty to undergo sacrifices if he "might save some," let us be inspired by his words, and through our motherhood use no liberty that shall become a stumbling block to our family. Psa. 60: 5. The lover of wine is a child of God; by getting Him to help us to cast out this enemy our loved ones will be saved. Psa. 62: 12. Psa. 51: 4. Though mercy belongs to God, justice demands that we receive such reward for our responsibility as our works command. The blood of our brother is on our head if we warn him not, or neglect our duty. Heb. 2: 13. Always remember that our own hearts must be at peace with God, and then we can lead to Him the children. Words without example have no moral force as character-builders. Acts. 2: 39. The promises of such blessings, such ennobling lives, such purity, such perfect eternity. Can we forget His words, can we rest content without striving for the "excellency of speech and wisdom" and of the knowledge of Christ Jesus our Lord? Psa. 67: 1–2.

SHORT TEMPERANCE TALKS.

BY MISS C. S. BURNETT.

No. 6.—Why the Rumsellers Talk.

Because they, like Demetrius the silversmith, who made shrines for Diana, see that "this our craft is in danger to be set at naught," since "Paul hath persuaded and turned much people," and "that the great goddess should be despised and her magnificence destroyed, whom the world worshipeth." And "moreover ye know that by this craft we have our wealth." Many Pauls have arisen who have caused the great god Bacchus to be despised and his magnificence set at naught whom all the world worships.

So there is "no small stir" since their craft is to be destroyed, and their gains which have come through the ignorance of these worshipers of this false god are to be taken from them. "And the whole land is full of confusion." The owners of the five hundred thousand temples of Bacchus see that "we are in danger to be called into question for this our work." Bacchus, so long worshiped unmolested, now sits trembling on his throne, and his followers tremble, too, lest they may lose the eight cents profit on a ten cent drink, and so they talk and talk of "personal liberty," till we would almost suppose that this "land of the free" grants right to do wrong; whereas "on account of the hardness of men's hearts," as did Moses, it only tolerates it. Our "personal liberty" is a very restricted thing after all, since one man's rights end where another's begin. No man has a right to injure another man's person, property, health, or reputation. The liquor dealer does all these, and because men cry out against this wrong they talk of "our rights."

The great principle underlying all law is that the right of the few must ever be made subservient to the right of the many. The majority shall rule, and the majority now say to this traffic "Thus far and no farther."

Correspondence.

TRANS-CONTINENTAL LETTER NO. II.

DEAR UNION SIGNAL.—The verses for today in my "Bible Forget-me-nots" which dear Madge Hillis gave me the day I bade her good bye, are "I will shew thee what thou shalt do," "I am with thee and no man shall set on thee to hurt thee." The realization of Christ's continued presence, though that presence be scarce articulate, gives quietness of spirit, steadiness of aim and consequent strength in action. When this presence becomes a voice and we hear the words, "I am with thee, I will shew thee what thou shalt do," when the spiritual sense becomes keen, so that one can see "the mountains full of chariots and horses," then the quiet, steady, strong soul becomes the victorious warrior, "the more than conqueror".

As I consider the needs of our work everywhere, this qualification for service becomes to me of more vital importance. Our numbers are increasing, our influence is widening and recognized by friend and foe; our machinery becoming more complex, we more than ever need the Spirit's power in our midst. We are under such mighty pressure, issues involving our sacred cause are so rapidly developing, the car of Christian progress is making such rate of speed, that the head light fed with common oil, shall not sately show the way. O for the electric light of His illumining! May he show us all what we shall do.

I wrote you last at Pueblo. At Sante Fe, the queer old Mexican town, that brings the smile as we remember the adobe houses, the packed "burras" in the narrow streets, we found a few good women who were one with us in heart, and who against great odds were "keeping the station," as Miss Willard puts it. The Synod of the Presbyterian church of Colorado, New Mexico and Arizona being in session, I spoke by invitation before them. As I walked to the new pretty church bearing testimony to the living truths of a pure gospel in the midst of a mummy-like remainder of a past civilization, my heart exclaimed "How beautiful are thy tents O Jacob! and thy dwelling place O Israel." The worshipers that evening were our own people with converted Mexicans, and Indians in buckskin and blankets. It was strange enough to speak through an interpreter, as I did awhile. Several lady teachers sent by the Presbyterian board to these Mexican missions were present; they are as truly of the heroic band of gospel messengers as those on India's shores.

We visited the territorial legislature in session, and were interested to know that advanced legislation concerning woman's civil rights had been secured. Formerly the laws of the territory were in this regard most oppressive. I am informed that Mrs. Governor Sheldon was "a friend at court" and did not forget her people and her kindred. The ladies who were at the White House when the Lucy Hayes' memorial picture was presented will remember Mrs. Sheldon as Mrs. Garfields' friend. We called upon her in the government building known as "the palace," and for years the home of Mexican royalty. It was in this house that Gen. Lew Wallace wrote Ben Hur. By the way I remember to have heard that Gen. Wallace was once asked how he—a man—could so perfectly embody in a certain character the real mother love. His answer was, "Because I had myself such a mother." We who know our "Mother Wallace" do not wonder at his reply. Albuquerque, New Mexico, is a real live American town scarce three years old; it owes its growth to the railroad interests which center here. The Atlantic and Pacific begins its "short route" to the Pacific from this point and car shops and similar railroad adjuncts are here. I like the spirit of the town: bright, active and with words of cheer for everybody. The churches have a strong hold and the ministers are a band of sturdy men who are taking possession in the name of the King. Here let me remark of the difference I note in the atmosphere of certain Christian workers and the tone of their efforts.

Some really good people labor at a snail's pace and in a sort of apologetic way which provokes repulse and almost insures defeat. A by-stander "waiting to be hired" would never offer his service to these, they never attract to themselves and thus decoy any into companionship in toil. Other laborers march so grandly on and with such evident joy in their work that lookers-on are attracted by the music of their lives and the rythm of their tread. Of this latter sort are the pastors and W. C. T. U. women of Albuquerque. The audience which gathered there was as fine as any Iowa audience, and was presided over by an Iowa man, Prof. McPherrin of the Albuquerque Academy and formerly at Tabor College, Tabor, Iowa. Mrs. McPherrin is president of the local union and Mrs. Snyder, also here, is president of the union for the territory. Mrs. Shields, of Colorado, has been through here and done substantial service in organization. I shall not soon forget the blessed hour we passed with the ladies in the afternoon nor the sweet face and gentle manners of my hostess Mrs. D. A. Sammis and her husband, lately from Massachusetts, who with his large business interests is standing for a true Puritanism in this new America. Also at Albuquerque is a government Indian school, under the management and partial support of the Presbyterian board of Home Missions. The superintendent Mr. R. W. D. Bryan, with his wife and faithful assistants, are doing more to solve the Indian problem than are our United States troops on the frontier; only on the forge of Christian education can swords be beaten into plow shares and spears into pruning hooks.

I was happy to address the pupils in the school room and to recall to their remembrance Miss Willard's visit of a year ago. It seems to me the commitment of Scripture to memory by these aforetime wholly untrained children of the plains was quite remarkable. After my visit forty-two of the scholars, as an exercise in composition, wrote letters giving their rendering of my talk to them. I will give one for your Children's Department, and commend the same to the average newspaper reporter as being fully up to the standard. From Albuquerque we came directly through to Los Angeles. I need not describe the dreary American Desert, with its hot breath, nor the strange sentinels of cacti, which guarded certain passes in the way, nor the motley groups of Indians and Mexicans that greeted the train at stations, nor of the great beauty of the flowers that burst out of the sand at the touch of water, nor of the grand mountains that are everywhere, always in the near or dim distance—all these have been written of so many times as to be quite familiar to all. I need only say, I am not disappointed; California is more beautiful than I thought.

I am now in the comfortable home of Mrs. S. A. Keyes, formerly of Iowa. She is permanently located here and active in church and W. C. T. U. work. In common with many a tired worker I have enjoyed her cordial hospitality in other days, and now am rested and refreshed with the cup of cold water from her hands. Her dear old mother who waits on the bank of the river for the heavenly convoy, and her daughter Connie, a very four-in-hand as temperance messenger, these make up this Christian household.

I have been in these parts ten days, and will, in my next, tell you of the work and of the workers. I am glad to close my message to you, dear UNION SIGNAL, with the Scripture adopted by these women of the W. C. T. U. of Southern California as their shibboleth, "For the battle is not yours but God's."

Yours sincerely,

J. ELLEN FOSTER.

"TO THE WORK—TO THE WORK."

Dear Union Signal:—For some time our national organizer, Miss Henrietta G. Moore, of Morrow, Ohio, has been thinking of a trip to Montana, and I wish you would mention that she will go there probably some time in June and later on to Washington territory and Oregon. Miss Moore has been most successful in her temperance work from the beginning and my southern letters unite in testifying to her noble character and valued services. It is a happy arrangement that she goes to the west this summer after a successful winters's work in the south.

You will all be glad to know that our dear Lois Smith, laid aside for months past, is at last convalescent. Cassie Smith has been at work in Rhode Island with the best results.

I lunched the other day in Providence with Mrs. Barney, our indefatigable Rhode Island leader, who told me that she expected the scientific temperance bill to pass before the session closes. No state is so thoroughly organized as the one over which this gentlest but most dauntless of women has the honor to preside.

We spent last Sabbath in the home of Mrs. Elizabeth B. Chace, of Valley Falls, where for a generation reformers have been welcomed to a refined and delightful hospitality. In 1865, Dr. Dio Lewis here preached his crusade gospel which was so bravely followed out by Mrs. Chace and her coadjutors that with the exception of one saloon, licensed for a brief period, Valley Falls, her home, has never been disgraced by the traffic in poisonous beverages. The story is an heroic one and will be published in Rhode Island W. C. T. U. annals. All goes well.

FROM THE LAND OF WOMAN'S BALLOT.

Dear Union Signal:—The W. C. T. U. organized by Mrs. Shields only a few months ago, although a feeble scion at first, has grown and prospered beyond all but a temperance woman's "fondest hopes and most sanguine expectations," and today stands firmly in the ranks of its "noble sisterhood."

We have now two hundred and fifty members enrolled, and already we begin to hear the tread of that young giant, "Prohibition," as he marches this way. The temperance work under the auspices of the W. C. T. U. is now approaching an interesting and important period in the history of "woman suffrage." Our city election transpires on the first Tuesday in May, and the temperance women have been holding a series of mass meetings with satisfactory results and much encouragement. At our last mass meeting, held a few nights ago, Mrs. E. S. Boyd, secretary of our W. C. T. U., delivered a strong stirring, earnest address before a large audience, choosing for her subject: "Our ticket; or a woman's reasons making a ticket."

Reason No. 1. Because we have a right in Wyoming territory to make one.

Reason No. 2. Because it is our turn now to make a ticket, adding that for years in the past, the men have made all the tickets and with their blandest smiles have asked us to vote for and with them, and we without murmur or complaint have marched up to the polls and helped them in every election, and now in "our turn," which has been so long coming, we ask the men to come and help us elect "our ticket," which is only their reasonable service.

Reason No. 3. Women are not office seekers, consequently they will not resort to the stratagem, intrigue, wire-pulling and trickery which has ever characterized our previous elections.

Reason No. 4. Women have no other incentive to urge them toward the consummation of their desire, only the best good, peace, happiness and prosperity of "hearth, home, and native land," doing all in the fear of God and to His honor and glory.

Our worthy secretary's appeal was received with the wild enthusiasm and hearty applause it so richly deserved. A delegation of ladies met a few days ago in solemn conclave to select as judiciously as possible, the best men for our temperance ticket, men who will carry out every measure of our prohibitory platform conscientiously and honestly. The ticket duly constructed a committee of ladies waited upon the gentlemen to ascertain their willingness to accept the nominations, for the offices of city treasurer, city clerk, and four aldermen.

When it was "noised about" that the women had a ticket to offer the people on the 6th of May, the rum party, went immediately to every livery stable in the city and engaged and hired every rig of every sort for the service of their own party on election day; thinking by this act to thwart the women's work by depriving them of vehicles by which to convey voters to and from the polls, as has always been the custom. However, the temperance people still rejoice in the proper use of their "bones and sinews," and more than that there are quite a number of temperance horses and carriages in the city at the disposal of the women, by which the aged and infirm can be carried to the polls, and the rest of us can go on foot, feeling that it were far better to go on foot to cast a vote for "God and humanity" than to ride in a "chaise" to cast a vote for the powers of darkness. Gov. St. John favored us not long ago with one of his great lectures and his words of good cheer and encouragement yet ring in our ears, and we are, by the help of God, girding ourselves for the conflict, hoping and earnestly praying for victory, at the same time resolved "never to be weary in well doing." The rum power here is strong and determined. With a population of about five thousand inhabitants there are twenty-five licensed saloons besides the low doggeries where they have no license.

Oh friends of this great temperance cause when you have read this letter will you not pause and lift up your hearts and hands toward heaven and ask God to give us the victory over our common enemy?

Yours for prohibition now and forever,

Sarah.

ON ORGANIZATION.

Dear Union Signal:—I have been requested to write my method of organizing new unions. "Your unions spring up as if by magic," a friend said to me, "how did you ever organize one hundred and sixty in eighteen months?"

In the first place the work was done in Ohio, where there is a great deal of temperance sentiment, and where the state officers are most efficient and helpful. Secondly, I saw that the work should be done, and did it in the most natural and common sense manner. When my audience was large, as it usually is on the Sabbath evening, I appointed a meeting of ladies for ten o'clock on Monday morning. Then it was easy to organize, as we were all of one accord. On week day evenings, in small towns, the work could be managed by taking a vote of the audience, men and women all raising the hand if they thought a W. C. T. U. in that place would be a good influence. Then the president of the evening was requested to act as clerk pro tem, taking down officers' names as they were chosen, while two ladies with papers and pencils (previously prepared) went among the audience for names of members. A few words explaining what membership implied were given, then we voted in the officers as they were nominated. This done, the ladies have not finished their work of securing names and there is time for two minute speeches, from clergymen and others. These men usually say, "We will help these women in the gospel of temperance."

An important influence is thus secured to help the new unions. In eight or ten minutes the work is done, a short prayer is offered for the success of the cause, the doxology sung, and benediction pronounced. The next morning the names of the officers are sent to headquarters, an address of welcome and a copy of minutes are sent to the new president by our corresponding secretary. I have been surprised by the amount of work by some of these new unions. One union, organized a rainy evening, with seven members, has grown to eighty-four; another has grown to one hundred and forty. Forty-nine members is the largest number that I have secured at the time of organizing, and five the smallest number.

There is need of this work in every state, for without these unions the work cannot be kept up, and the cause will languish. Wherever there is a saloon, wherever there is a village of fifty inhabitants, there the Christian women should organize for aggressive work.

National lecturers and organizers are now appointed, and they are ready to respond to calls, but they must work under the direction of the state officers in order to be successful. The appointments must be made, the work carefully prepared by some person of good executive ability before the arrival of the lecturer. Thus valuable time is saved, and when the speaker is on the ground they should move rapidly from one point to another, speaking every evening.

Massachusetts calls for more unions and I go there next week to work one month, but hope to return to Ohio for the annual meeting at Cincinnati in June. We all know the ability and the earnestness of the state officers there and the preparations will be just right. A great deal depends upon these preparations.

Our Ohio corresponding secretary has sometimes written six letters to secure a single appointment but when secured and a union planted, the return is an ample compensation.

These little signal stations will send out well defined temperance messages long after the hand that planted them has finished all its work.

As we look over the ten wonderful years since the crusade, and see the one hundred thousand noble Christian women who compose this army of workers, we feel that God had a meaning when He poured out His Spirit upon the daughters of the land, and daily we shall consecrate us anew to the work, knowing that what ought to be will be in God's own good time.

NOTES FROM CALIFORNIA.

Dear Union Signal.—A sojourn for six months in this state has brought some facts prominently to my notice. California needs prohibition sadly, desperately needs it. That is one fact: another is, that prohibition will be stoutly and bitterly opposed to the end. To match the above there bristles up the cheering reality, that a more earnest, determined, heroic band of workers can rarely be seen than those who champion the cause of prohibition here. When the fight becomes thick "Greek will meet Greek," and the stubborn "tug of war" will prove that those who fight for licensed iniquity reckon without their host if they enter the battle expecting an easy victory.

Wine making and wine drinking is rapidly becoming the curse of this whole state. During a stay of three months in the vicinity of San Francisco, I became so familiar with wine's imprint on the face that I could immediately detect a wine drinker. It coarsens the features by reddening the nose in a manner peculiar to itself, and completely obliterates the chiselled fineness of the nostrils, and detracts so thoroughly from the manly dignity of the features that its victim becomes necessarily lowered in your estimation as you look upon him. And this is the genteel drink, the nectar of the gods, that is going to elevate drink into a respectable habit!

And many who were radical temperance advocates at "the east" find it easy to persuade their conscience into allowing the claret to be placed on the table as a common beverage. Not only that, but persons of the same stamp, multitudes of them, so pettifog with themselves on the subject that they at last enter into the cultivation of the wine grape without let or hindrance. But I have found noble exceptions, who will not yield to the seductive temptation, but raise, instead, the raisin grape.

In the various places where I have been, I have been proud of the intelligent, prayerful, pertinacious agressiveness of the W. C. T. U's. everywhere.

God bless the noble wives and mothers who so bravely nail their colors to the mast and fling them to the breeze all over California!

I have been on the track of Mrs. J. Ellen Foster of Iowa, in several localities, and have thanked God and took courage at the golden opinions she is winning in all places. I am at present writing at Riverside, Southern California, where I was glad to find a late number of The Union Signal.

Our Children.

CRACKED.

'Twas a set of resolutions,
As fine as fine could be,
And signed in painstaking fashion,
By Nettie and Joe and Bee.
And last in the list was written,
In letters broad and dark
(To look as grand as the others),
"Miss baby Grace X her mark?"

"We'll try always to help our mother;
We won't be selfish to each other;
We'll say kind words to every one;
We won't tie pussy's feet for fun;
We won't be cross and snarly, too;
And all the good we can, we'll do."

"It's just as easy to keep them,"
The children gladly cried:
But mamma, with a smile made answer—
"Wait darlings, till you are tried."
And truly, the glad, bright New Year
Wasn't his birthday old,—
When three little sorrowful faces
A sorrowful story told.

"And how are your resolutions?"
We asked of the baby, Grace.
Who stood with a smile of wonder
On her dear little dimpled face,
Quick came the merry answer
She never an instant lacked,—
"I don't fink much of 'em's broken.
But I dess 'em's 'bout all'c d!"

ONE TEMPERANCE PLEDGE.

BY A. C. MORROW.

"Get out there, you drunken vagabond! Get out, I say!"

That was what George Wilkin's father said to him one cold December Sabbath afternoon; and when "Old Tom Wilkins," as the boys all called him, spoke in that rough, angry tone of voice the son knew he must obey him or suffer the consequences. George left the den he called home, and wandered listlessly about the streets until his unhappy thoughts were arrested by the sound of music. He stopped and listened.

"Come to Jesus, come to Jesus just now," were the words he heard distinctly. He knew no more of Jesus than if he had been a native of Africa, but very sweet the refrain sounded as it floated out to him, cold, desolate, and forlorn as he was.

It was a mission Sunday school. He sauntered in, and stood just within the doorway as the boys and girls concluded the chorus. There he stood during all the prayer, the very picture of poverty, his coat and pants torn and soiled, and his face and hands looking as though it was long since they had enjoyed the luxury of water.

The superintendent finished his prayer, but no one took any notice of the strange ragged boy by the door. He turned to leave the room, when a kind voice arrested him, and looking back, he saw a lady approaching him. She extended her hand.

"My boy, I am glad to see you. I have a class of boys here; I wish you would come and join them."

"I ain't fit," he answered.

"Oh! yes you are," the teacher answered.

He followed her reluctantly. As they reached the class the boys giggled, and though there was plenty of room for him did not offer him a seat.

The teacher's little seven year old Greta, who occupied a chair by her mother, rose, saying, "Take my seat, please." Then, turning to the rude boys, she asked pleasantly, "Will you make room for me to sit by you?"

I cannot tell what the teacher said to those boys that afternoon, but it was a temperance lesson; and when she had finished she took out a temperance pledge and asked them to sign it.

When it came to George, he said, decidedly, "No."

"Why not?"

"'Cause I like gin and brandy too well."

Before her mother could answer him little Greta had risen to her feet and stood beside him. There were tears in her blue eyes, and her voice trembled. "I wish you would," she said.

"Ta'nt no use; I couldn't keep it."

"I would pray the Lord to help you," the child said, "and then he could—couldn't he, mamma?"

"I believe he could, if he would ask the Lord."

"Won't you?" the child pleaded.

"I vum, I b'lieve I'll try it, if only to please you," George answered her, taking the pen in his clumsy fingers and writing his name.

Before George left he had promised to come again, and carried with him a letter of introduction to a manufacturer who would give him work.

He did not dare to return home, so slept that night, supperless, as he had often done before, in an old cart.

The next morning he went with his letter to Mr. Brunn, the shoe manufacturer. When the proprietor had agreed to furnish him employment, at three dollars a week, the boy asked, "I haven't had any breakfast; could you lend me—"

"I'll lend you nothing," the man interrupted; "but wait here a moment."

He stepped into his office and addressed a boy, who went out, but presently returned with a ham sandwich and a foaming glass of beer, which he handed to George.

For twenty hours the boy had not tasted food. How tempting the sandwich looked, and how he longed for a taste of the beer! He reached out his hands to take them. Then he saw a childish face with blue eyes filled with tears, and heard a sweet voice say, "Won't you? I'll pray for you." His hand dropped at his side again.

"What does this mean?" the proprietor asked.

"I can't drink the lager; I promised I wouldn't," the boy answered stoutly.

"Oh! you've signed the pledge, have you?"

"Yes, sir."

"Here, Jim," he said to the office boy, "give the boy the sandwich, and take the lager back and get him a glass of milk."

"Thank you," George said, simply.

It was the first time the words had ever passed his lips. But he was learning, faster than he knew, how Christianity refines and elevates.

He finished his frugal breakfast and went to the work assigned him happier than he had ever been.

I cannot tell you all the ways in which George was tempted, but he continued to attend the mission school, and learned to pray for himself, and grew to be a thoughtful, devoted Christian boy.

This was thirteen years ago. George is now the superintendent of that mission school. He never broke his pledge.—Sunday School Times.

A LETTER TO THE CAPTAIN FROM THE GENERAL.

Dear Captain Deborah:—Mrs. Livermore tells me they have six hundred children on the roll at Melrose. In selecting a name for the society, the ladies resolved to consult the young folks themselves. "Will you be called a Band of Hope?"

"No—Don't want to belong to that."

"Will you be a Temperance school?" No—Don't like the name school."

"What will you be then?"

From many a throat came the bright chorus.

"Temperance Wide-awakes, that's what we'll be!"

So the name was settled, and it is a good one.

This scene reminded me of the one in New York when the young ladies' union was organizing its temperance club of boys, and after proposing several names they did not like, asked them their preference and got this vigorous and unanimous reply. "True Blue Cadets," and so they are.

Mrs. G. N. Bordman, of Melrose, is our most gifted and inventive worker in the specialty of entertainments prepared by the children themselves. Her book "The Temperance Clarion" should be owned by every juvenile worker in the land. She teaches charming "Motion songs," has pretty scenes as "The six little grandmas" and others, in which the droll Kate Greenaway "old folks" costume is worn by the little folks.

I wish Mrs. Bordman would come to Chicago and show our Band of Hope committee "how fields are won." She is just now working up another of those great Tremont Temple meetings of children. Gov. Robinson will speak. He is a thorough-going total abstainer.

I send you a "temperance alphabet" prepared by a literary man in Concord, Mass., who takes a great interest in the juvenile society there.

Be of good cheer, Captain Deborah! Beat the drum, wave the banner, bring out the muster roll and invite us all to sign—the big and little, the grave and gay.

Yours for the war,
Frances Willard

"MOEGE IHR DIE ERDE LEICHT SEIN."*

BY ADA H. KEPLEY.

Rest softly earth upon her breast,
Who nourished me in helplessness,
Who gave the home, that blessed nest,
Rich largess of unselfishness.

Rest softly earth upon the heart,
That beat with constant tenderness,
For all whom she with loving art,
Gave daily of her helpfulness.

Rest softly on silent lips
That once smiled in cheerfulness.
O'er clasped hands and quiet feet;
O'er eyes that shone forgivingness.

Oh earth, we lay her in thy breast,
Our hearts feel grief's deep bitterness;
As here we place her, long to rest,
Our souls feel all life's littleness.

Though grief may wear the human heart,
That mourns its loss in humanness,
Rest softly, till no more we part,
She taught us faith's bright hopefulness.

* "May the earth rest softly upon her." A German saying of one dead.

THE ANTIQUE CLOAK.

BY LUCY H. WASHINGTON.

The best side of our UNION SIGNAL is shown in the blended shades of its many sided opinions and suggestions, upon the various phases of our rapidly branching work. From palace to prison, from parlor to pantry, from dissertation to dessert, from franchise to fans, etc.

An outside topic suggests the present writing; nothing less than the "consecrated velvet dress" we recently read about. I want to tell of a more difficult consecration of a a less expensive garment. It was in this wise: Among the invitations to "Come and help us" was one received from one of our largest cities, to speak in a wealthy aristocratic church. As the time of appointment drew near the speaker could not be obedient to the command to take no thought what she should put on. The best frock would do very well, the bonnet (thanks to varying fashion) would pass muster with the turning of a tip and the ironing of ties, although the snows of winters had fallen harmlessly upon it. But the cloak! During four years it had served, and those who stay not for storm know what that means. A mental controversy had been held over it, early in the season, which had resulted in a compromise; new binding, new buttons, a vigorous brushing, and the faithful garment was consecrated to another season's wear.

Upon the evening of appearing the controversy was renewed with vigor. Pride said, "Get a new one, you need it." Economy said, "Look well to your purse; you can't afford it." Reflection said, "Suppose it is not new and fine and in style, a woman is a woman 'for a' that.'" "True," chimed Pride, "but strangers will judge you from appearances. You would be more at ease, more self forgetful in a better cloak." Just here Calculation showed the balance sheet of income and expense, including college and school girl bills. Conscience said "No," which settled the matter for the time.

Soon after arriving upon the field my hostess announced a caller who was interested in prison work. Would I visit the jail in the morning and speak to the prisoners? (There! as the children say, I have given myself away, and may as well go on in the first person). Yes, I would visit the jail. I had commenced prison work in connection with the crusade, and subsequently passed through many barred doors. The morning was charming. About one hundred prisoners, including several women, and perhaps fifty visitors composed the audience. What a privilege to speak to those in prison. As I looked upon the faded calicos and tattered shawls of the women, I was glad my cloak was no better, but oh! that these, many of whom had been robbed of their birthright before birth, whose lives had been a heritage of depraved appetite, yet for whom Christ died, oh that they might be ultimately clothed upon with immortality.

Some cheering testimony was given by visitors. Said one, "For years I was a miserable drunkard in this city, but during the last five years I have been the child of a King." As we sang "Pass me not, oh gentle Savior," we knew the Master was there.

From the jail to the church, what a contrast! All at once the cloak that wouldn't stay consecrated, came to my thought. There were seal skins to right of me, seal skins to left of me, fur-lined in front of me. I sympathized with my hostess, whose seal skin rested so softly, kindly and richly beside my plain cloth—wondered if any one would think I was a "poor relation come a visiting." I recalled the verse learned in childhood, to the effect that none should take pride in apparel, since

"The very sheep and silk worms wore,
The self same clothing long before."

After all where is the great difference between a seal and a sheep? Ah! but the distinction appears with second hand wearers. And there is a distinction, it was resolved by our beloved president when riding in the palace car, upon her last five dollars, when appearances indicated there was plenty more in the purse. This distinction was recognized in the social tone indicated by the consecrated velvet dress; also, I may add, in the reported "white-gloved colored waiters" who served at the W. C. T. U. reception.

During the crusade the presence of women of wealth and social position in our bands excited an influence and commanded a respect that was undeniable. It is justly a cause of rejoicing that our W. C. T. Unions of today can claim, "of chief women not a few." Chief in many ways. Some chief because wives of chief men. Thousands of women have banished wine from the home. There was but one Lucy Hayes, the light of whose example was shed to the remotest corners of our land and flashed across the seas. Some chief in legal knowledge, some in suggestive teaching, others in social power, and yet others, many others, in self sacrifice and clinging faith. I doubt if the widow of the "two mites" was regarded as chief in her day, but she has become chief in history, as also she of the alabaster box of ointment. I sometimes wonder if anybody praised Dorcas until after she was dead; she who was chief in example of sweet charity to all ages.

But to return to my subject. Commencing service bade us call home our wandering thoughts, which I had nearly succeeded in doing when the text was announced. Dear woman, what do you suppose it was? "Now they have no cloak for their sins." It is safe to say that the coat of that text fitted none others as it fitted me. Before evening the cloak was so far consecrated that it gave no troubled thought, I only prayed the Master would own and bless the service undertaken in His name, and felt that the prayer was answered.

DR. MORROW'S SCHOLAR.

A HINT TO DISCOURAGED TEACHERS.

"You may leave this Sunday school now, and you needn't be slow about getting out of the room either, and you need never come back again either, never—do you hear?"

It was young Dr. Morrow talking to one of his Sunday school boys, a rude, ungoverned and seemingly ungovernable boy, who thoroughly enjoyed disturbing the whole class, not only with his inattention, but also with his actions.

Dr. Morrow's patience had been worn threadbare during the past few weeks, and now that Jim Dunbar had succeeded in getting the whole class with but one exception laughing, and that one exception crying (because a bee which Jim had held imprisoned in a coiled handkerchief had been let out cautiously into his ear and it had stung him), the last thread of that much-suffering virtue gave out, and Dr. Morrow, in his anger, wished that Jim Dunbar would never cross his path again.

The fun all died out of Jim's face as he heard the stern command. One quick, reproachful but mortified glance into Dr. Morrow's angry, reproving face, and then the boy started to leave the room. Just before reaching the door he looked up at the beautiful motto over the arch. It had never looked so lovely before—at least that was what Jim thought: "Suffer the little ones to come unto Me, and forbid them not, for of such is the kingdom of heaven." That was the motto.

Jim thought of many things as he crossed the threshold and wandered down toward the river. Dr. Morrow had explained that beautiful motto to him, and now some of his thoughts ran after this fashion:

"He said I was one of the little fellows the Savior wanted, but I guess he's mistaken. I'm too big, most eleven; 'sides that, Dr. Morrow said I should never come back again—so I'm forbid, you see—any way I guess I don't belong to the kingdom, else I wouldn't be so mean, that's a fact. I wanted to be good though, real good, but somehow, I don't know just how, the bad keeps a comin' out all the time; I guess I won't even try to be good any more. What's the use? I ain't got any one to tell me how, and 'sides Dr. Morrow says folks can't be good 'less they get near the Savior, an' I can't get near Him, 'cause I dassent go back to the school, an' the Savior never comes to our house, never."

However, as the moments flew by, Jim thought no more about the Savior, but amused himself by throwing sticks and stones into the river, digging holes in the bank and frightening a timid child who came in search for wild flag. He did not go home until he became so hungry that he could not do otherwise. Your heart will go out in pity toward Jim as you enter his home. It is the abode of squalor and wretchedness. His father lies on a rude bed asleep in drunkenness. His mother sits leaning back in an old wooden rocker, her eyes fixed mechanically upon the blank wall. She starts a little as Jim enters, and drawls forth:

"You're late, Jim."

"Don't seem to make any difference whether I'm late or early—things always look the same," mutters Jim, throwing down his old cap, and drawing near a grimy table pushed against the wall, upon whose one raised leaf, guiltless of table cloth, the remains of a miserable meal lay scattered.

"Don't be sassy, Jim," drawled his mother.

"I ain't sassy, but I'm hungry—what ye got to eat, mother?"

"Ye can see for yourself. What you botherin' yer tired mother for?"

Yes. Jim could see for himself, could see some dry crusts and half a glass of beer. He looked at them in disgust.

"We've potatoes, mother—a whole peck of em—why didn't you bakesome?" he asked.

"'Cause I didn't feel like it—Sunday's a day of rest."

Jim crunched the dry bread and drank the beer; and as for the remains of the pickle, he threw it across the room.

Dr. Morrow lived in the suburbs. The walk home was unusually pleasant; now in his perturbed state he did not enjoy it.

He had done right, of course, in sharply reprimanding that tiresome Jim Dunbar, but had he done right in forbidding him ever to set foot in God's house again? Supposing God should treat his children so?

After dinner Dr. Morrow dropped asleep in his comfortable library chair. He had scarcely entered the land of dreams when he saw a face of surpassing beauty watching him, then a voice said lovingly, yet beseechingly: "Feed my lambs." Then he walked on, his pathway strewn with roses, and pretty soon he saw the lovely face again and heard the gentle voice repeat, yearningly, "Feed my lambs." Then from over a blossoming hedge he soon heard the voice again, saying, oh! so lovingly: "Suffer the little ones to come unto me and forbid them not." He looked and saw the Savior pointing to another pathway, strewn with thorns and stones. It was far in the distance, and yet he saw a little traveler forcing his way along wearily and painfully. For a moment the small, pinched face turned towards him beseechingly, the arms were held out pleadingly, and then the boy turned his face away. But that moment had been enough for Dr. Morrow to recognize the face as Jimmy Dunbar's. He groaned aloud and then awoke. The afternoon sun was streaming into the library windows; all aglow were the charming pictures of the "Madonna and Child" upon the wall. He looked at the child's face.

"He came into the world to seek and save the lost—how dare I judge a child so harshly?" he thought sorrowfully.

The Sabbath was not yet over when there came a rap at Jimmy Dunbar's door. It was Jimmy who opened it, and over his white, discouraged face, a scared look crept as he recognized Dr. Morrow. What was he going to do? Put him in the "lockup" perhaps for letting that hateful bee sting little Dan Phelps. No, that was not Dr. Morrow's intention. He took his hand kindly and said, huskily: "You did not do right this morning, my boy, neither did I. I have forgiven you, Jimmy; you forgive me and we'll both do better in the future. Come to the Sunday school as usual, Jimmy. I'm a little stronger than you and I want to help you climb up to your Heavenly Father." Then Dr. Morrow went into the wretched little room, and went out again with tears in his eyes. But there were no tears in Jim's eyes as he unpacked a great basket of fruit and untied a package of picture papers from Dr. Morrow. There was a deep joy in his heart, and he said, feelingly: "Oh! how good Dr. Morrow is, how he pities a fellow who is down. After all, I don't wish I was dead, I'd rather try to get into the kingdom."—Westminster Teacher.

TOPIC: VICTORY OVER DEATH.

LESSON TEXT.—I. Cor. 15, 50-58.
GOLDEN TEXT.—Death is swallowed up in victory.
TIME.—A. D. 57.

1. This explicit teaching of Paul's concerning the resurrection body is occasioned by the question in verse 35: "How are the dead raised up? and with what body do they come?"

Having previously shown the foundation of the Christian faith, the fact of Christ's resurrection, Paul rebukes the objections offered by pointing to God's works in nature, to the difference between the seed sown and the plant which perpetuates its life, and between the endless variety of living bodies on earth and the objects which shine and move above us in the sky. He declares that there is a similar difference between our present and future bodies, a difference of which he gives four powerful parallel descriptions.

2. The sting of death is sin," and not alone of death and the life beyond, but of the life here, the preparation life.

Said a young man who had gone out into the world with more than ordinarily bright prospects, one possessed of an unusually brilliant mind, but who had returned to his mother an utter wreck, mentally and physically, "O, the years I have wasted in sin! I cannot be forgiven for it all, my sins are too many and too great." Coming into the light after months of struggle, his one theme is the wondrous loving kindness of his Savior in forgivng him, and the mother's love that has gone out for him all these years. And yet the "sting" must ever remain, although manfully striving to redeem his past life, to bring others to the Fountain wherein he has plunged and has been made clean. Yet past influence can never be recalled, and regrets because of it can never cease.

3. "Thanks be to God which giveth us the victory" over sin, and over death which came because of sin. A victory which makes us "new creatures in Christ," which enables us to say "Old things have passed away, and behold all things have become new."

A victory which gives us the blessed assurance, "Now are we the sons of God, and it doth not yet appear what we shall be, but we know that, when He shall appear, we shall be like Him; for we shall see Him as He is." Like Christ here, we may be, we should be, but by and by the likeness shall be made perfect.

4. This promised victory should enable us to be steadfast, unmoveable, to present our bodies living sacrifices, to be not conformed to this world, but transformed by the renewing of our minds.

5. The Christian's faith should not only anticipate joy "over there" but should make his life on earth so bright and joyous, his face to so reflect the brightness of Christ that those who have not his blessed hope in the appearing of our Lord and Savior, shall be irresistibly drawn thither.

A NEW RICHARD IN THE FIELD.

The latest beneficent effort of which we have knowledge, is the incorporation of a National Temperance Hospital and Medical College association whose object is the practical demonstration of temperance principles in the administration of medicine and the introduction of temperance truth in medical education. Its incorporators are Dr. Mary Weeks Burnett, Mrs. Evelyn N. Peters, Mrs. L. H. Plumb, Mrs. J. Ellen Foster, Mrs. Mary B. Willard, Mrs. Elizabeth Boynton Harbert and Mrs. A. P. Kelley. These trustees are known as temperance women of energy and perseverance as well as of ideas of firmly rooted principles. Their purpose in this movement is to aid in founding an institution which shall do for America what the London Temperance Hospital is doing for the medical temperance reform in Great Britain.

The customs and climate of England differ so greatly from ours, that the statistics of this institution cannot be accepted by us as more than a general estimate. We should have the most carefully compiled statistics of medical practice in the conditions of our own country.

The need of physicians who prescribe alcohol only as other poisons are used, or not at all, is the crying need of our reform. More often than in any other way, American men and women are led into the regions of intemperance through the gateway of the alcoholic medical prescription. Demonstration of the needlessness of alcohol preceding and accompanying the training and education of the physician will establish temperance doctrine as few other agencies can, and the hospital and college together will contribute to a hitherto unfilled want. The constitution of the organization forbids incurring debt in the furtherance and maintenance of the enterprise and no steps will be taken toward "materializing" the project until the funds are in hand or reliably pledged thereto.

The hospital is intended for the treatment of all forms of disease and will be open to applicants from all parts of the United States, with wards for paying and non-paying patients, the treatment to be in all cases non-alcoholic.

A large advisory board will be made up from the best material this country affords, among men and women medical and otherwise. The college faculty and hospital superintendents will be drawn from the ranks of men and women of ability, and a broad plan and outlook will, it is thought, characterize all the plans and operations of the new society.

MORE NEW BOOKS.

If you want to give a pretty, and at the same time useful wedding present, there is none better than The Complete Home, written by our temperance story teller, Julia McNair Wright, and published by Wm. Garretson & Co., 177 S. Clark street, Chicago. And by the way, a book reviewed by us some time since, Buried Cities Recovered, should have been credited to the same firm, rather than to a house of similar name in Philadelphia.

To one who would attain not alone to the high art of house keeping, but to the higher art of home making and home keeping, the book is invaluable. Its easy, conversational style dispels all fears of pedantic effort to teach one how to do, while it really does teach, in winsome fashion, the very best way of doing almost every thing, from providing a wholesome sanitary house to the training of children. It teaches a wise economy, not alone of money, but of those more precious things, the mother's time and strength; it makes upright business principles and good business habits seem as desirable for our daughters as for our sons, and it recognizes the truth that the life is more than meat and the body than raiment, and that it is more important that the mother should be able to meet the questionings and needs of her children's minds and hearts than that she should be able to ruffle their dresses or pamper their appetites.

Two smaller volumes bearing also on the well being of our young people are, Our Business Boys, by Rev. F. E. Clarke, and Health and Strength for Girls, by Dr. Mary Safford and Mary E. Allen, of Boston. Both are published by D. Lothrop & Co.

The author of the former, a Portland (Me.) clergyman, took the pains to write to nearly a hundred business men of that city these two questions:

1. What has experience taught you to be the most essential conditions of true business success at the present day?

2. What especial dangers, from a practical business man's point of view, threaten the young men of to-day?

The answers to these inquiries are given in the book, and are, in nearly every instance, the same. Summed up into the smallest compass, the answer to the first question was always "Go-at-it-iveness, stick-to-it-iveness, politeness and honesty," and to the second, "Bad literature, cigars, low theaters, Sabbath breaking, and evil companions."

The second of these helpful little volumes is a practical demonstration by the sensible physician and the wise gymnast of the right way to dress, to breathe, to walk, to study, to exercise and to rest. Dr. Safford is widely known, and Miss Allen is superintendent of the Boston Ladies and Children's Gymnasium, and thoroughly versed in the best methods of training the human body. Half the mothers in the community are absolute heathen so far as knowledge of the laws of health are concerned, and thousands of children are every year offered up as sacrifices to this ignorance, and to a desire to have their girls dress and look "stylish." French boots, compression of the waist, tea and coffee—and highly seasoned food, are among the agencies which are steadily undermining the health of multitudes of girls of from ten to fifteen, and which either send them to their graves or afflict them with diseases and deformities which make life a burden. We wish this little book could be distributed through the country free. The result would well pay for the expense in educating both parents and daughters in those very things they ought most to know.

THROUGH the kindness of Mrs. G. S. Hunt of of Portland, we are in possesion of a few clippings from papers of the year 1845. They are yellow and wrinkled as age is apt to be, but they tell the story of Maine's early devotion to the cause of reform. Doubtless they are samples of the "knee deep" seed sowing in which the early reformers engaged. One gives Lord Chesterfield's argument (before the House of Lords) for prohibition, and others contain such "bits" as these:

—In our legislature are five representatives—Oak of Garland, Lampson of Troy, White of Windham, Edgecomb of Vienna, and Merrill of New Sharon—belonging to the Liberty party. The Bangor Gazette says of them: "They are good men and true, ready to act promptly on any question involving the great principles of human rights. They are, moreover, firm and consistent temperance men (who knows of a Liberty man that is not?) and will be found the warm friends of every measure having for its end the substantial good of the people of our state."

—If Prince Albert were drunk, he would be called elated; if Lord Tristam were drunk he would be called elevated; if Mr. Plum, the rich merchant, were drunk, he would be called inebriated; if a respectable tradesman be drunk, he would be intoxicated; but if a workman be in liquor, it would be said that the nasty beast was as drunk as a pig.

—The mayor of Albany, we are informed, refuses to abide by the new excise law, and grants licenses for selling intoxicating drinks the same as though the people were willing. It remains to be seen whether he really governs the city, or whether the people themselves do.

—McConnell, the drunken congressional blackguard, recently offered an amendment to the mineral land bill, viz., to appropriate $25,000 to erect a public grocery at the Falls of Niagara, and to furnish it with an assortment of liquors, and said he should next make a proposition which is too indecent to mention. Finding his vulgarity did not raise a laugh, he turned himself upside down, with his head in the seat of his chair, and his legs on his desk, and in that elegant position sought repose which he did not enjoy the preceding night.

MISS WILLARD sends from her New York desk the following:

DEAR UNION SIGNAL:—I bought the ever wide-awake Springfield Republican on the cars this morning, coming from Norfolk, Ct. One editorial paragraph contains pabulum for reflection of a most nutritious sort, so much so that I wish to share it with our white ribbon army. The italics are my own.

Yours "on the bright lookout,"

FRANCES E. WILLARD.

Family quarrels are lost sight of when the neighborhood fight comes. It is strange how quickly the western temperance controversies have dropped out of sight upon the appearance of the presidential campaign. Of course an enthusiast makes himself heard now and then declaring that one party or the other must pronounce for prohibition or be swept out of existence, but these persons are always heard and seem no more numerous now than in years before, and no man in his senses dreams that the rum question will cut any considerable figure in the campaign or that either national convention will give the teetotalers more than an empty compliment. Doubtless some Germans in Ohio and elsewhere who left the republicans for the democratic ticket in the local contests will fail to get back, and others who have heretofore voted for republican national candidates will this year support a prohibition ticket, but there are offsets to these losses, and nobody can say that the thing is not as broad as it is long.

THE Woman's Journal, of Boston, has reprinted one of the leaflets published by the Illinois W. C. T. U., and entitled, "Why the W. C. T. U. of Illinois Seeks the Ballot." The compliment is not unappreciated, but an explanation is due the public, since in reprinting the article the Woman's Journal has omitted the word "Illinois," making the title of its tract read, "Why the W. C. T. U. Seeks the Ballot"—not realizing, doubtless, that the entire W. C. T. U. is not seeking the ballot—many states being much opposed to it.

I am afraid Miss Narcissa White will not report her work if THE SIGNAL types make many more such blunders as saying that she has organized "two new unions in as many days" when it was ten: but then even typograpers have their rights, and one is to "clear copy," O, if only everybody would cultivate penmanship!

Rose Phillips, the "ever faithful"—the conscientious, self sacrificing corresponding secretary of the Missouri W. C. T. U. is precariously ill. A surgical operation is threatened. Pray, good sisters all!

Miss Jennie Duty, so long a "power" seen and unseen in Ohio, and Cleveland W. C. T. U. affairs has been prostrated for weeks by reason of over work, and is still seriously ill. May the God of all consolation make this "shut in" experience as blessed to her as she has been to her work! One could not ask more.

**

"The Sham Family" are to be escorted through the halls of Chautauqua this summer, by J. C. Ambrose, who has piloted them throughout the west during the past winter to their and everybody's satisfaction.

**

The National Superintendent of Railroad Rates is no more. No more Miss Anna Sneed of Kirkwood, Mo., but Mrs. John G. Cairns of St. Louis. The happy event which so metamorphosed her took place at Kirkwood Seminary April 8, and congratulations have been pouring in upon Mr. Cairns ever since.

The noble fifty-two who voted prohibition into the statutes of Iowa, have been photographed by an enterprising photographer, and a copy handsomely framed hangs on the wall of W. C. T. U. headquarters in Des Moines as his gift.

Some people think I "bide" on my watch tower continually. Nay, verily, the microscope hath its uses no less than the telescope, and that means "looking close." I flit about here and there, seeing many things, the half of which can never be told.

But this I must tell, I saw two temperance tramps tired and worn as they journeyed to a W. C. T. U. convention in southern Illinois. I saw them mount the steps of a beautiful home, saw the door open and a benevolent gentleman ushered them in with hearty hand shake and cordial welcome, I saw his wife approach them from an inner door, and heard the "good man of the house" say cheerily "these, my dear, are our friends whom we have been expecting." Ah, I could see down into their transparent souls the gladness and rest that such welcome brought them. If it was only always so with everybody.

And of many friendly places, commend me to Carthage, Missouri, where hearts are so warm to temperance that the temperance worker fares royally at their hands. A live W. C. T. U. is that of southwestern Missouri, presided over by Mrs. Sarah Foster, who is fit gardener for such a spot. Her helpers are legion and energetic beyond telling.

Miss Helen Walker who won by her activities the banner superintendency of UNION SIGNAL work, has "located" a claim in Dakota and is keeping as watchful eye upon its possession and prospects as a short time ago she gave to UNION SIGNAL interests in Illinois. Every acre of itought to yield its best to so faithful a worker.

The Louisiana annual conference of the M. E. church south, which adopted such vigorous temperance resolution at its late session, is as vigorously engaged to carry them out in petitions to the legislature. The leading spirit seems to be, Rev. W. H. Goodale of Baton Rouge, whose name is sha ed by that most fai hful and gentle spirit, the presiding genius of Baton Rouge W. C. T.U.

The Y. W. C. T. U. of the West Side in this city having a flourishing kindergarten on their hands beside other demands, found themselves $200 in debt a few weeks ago. Miss Lucia Kimball is their patron saint, and with her aid the sum was speedily cancelled. It is good to have such a friend at court.

The author of "What a friend we have in Jesus," i. e. the music of the song, Judge C. C. Converse, of Erie, Pa., wrote up the new coffee house of the W. C. T. U. of that city most charmingly in the Daily Dispatch at the time of its opening. "Coffee, cheer and chat," he says are the graces of the place."

A little bird whispers to me that he did more than "write it up," that he bought a thousand tickets, and gave one hundred beautifully decorated cups and saucers to the outfit.

The Triennial International S. S. Convention, meeting at Louisville, June 11–13, has, through its program committee, invited Miss Willard and Mrs. Chapin to address the assembly, on temperance in the Sunday school. Miss Lucia Kimball, National Superintendent of S. S. Work in the W. C. T. U. will also be on hand and with Col. Bain these ladies will interest a large temperance mass meeting held during the progress of the convention.

Remenyi rosins his bow with total abstinence, and the Swedish Lady Quartette of Chicago emulates his zeal for "the cause" by singing in its behalf. Lewiston, Ill., was the recent recipient of one of their "benefits".

Miss Kimball's new Sunday school circular has full instruction for organizing Bands of Hope in the Sunday school. Nobody need to hesitate now.

This too I think is worth telling and knowing, that Prof. J. Dorman Steele spent the past winter in the north when his health requires an annual "flitting" southward, simply to make ready the proper scientific temperance instruction tor the public schools in which the new law requires it.

ON DUTY.

News From the Field.

MISSOURI.

Ritchey.—We have had temperance meetings all winter with constantly increasing interest.

We organized our union Jan 1, have also a Band of Hope. Mr. Holt was with us three nights, and we have had other good workers, including Mrs. Clardy. Several copies of The Union Signal are taken, and all who have it think it indispensable.

We are now circulating temperance literature and hope to reach many thus far beyond us. Cor. Sec.

Sedalia.—Is called the "Queen City of the Prairies" and for beauty and elegance, is not undeserving of the title. She claims a population of twenty thousand and is situated in the very centre of our great centre, Missouri. It was named in honor of the daughter of its founder, General Geo. R. Smith, who has her home here, and is an honored, sympathetic and zealous friend of the W. C. T. U.

Five years ago thirteen ladies organized a union and did some good work, part of it being to establish a Free Temperance Reading-room and Public Library, the union only survived one year, the library still exists. The word "temperance" has been dropped from its original name. A new organization of the union was effected on Dec. 11, 1882, two ladies only of the original organization becoming members of the new; so we are really only one year and four months old. All of last year it was a struggle for us to live, our number was small and the opposition great and powerful. We held several public meetings. Sent over one thousand names as signers to a prohibitory petition to our legislature; collected one hundred and ten dollars in money; distributed literature freely, and for a time, contributed temperance articles for the press. This year we decided to use all honorable means to create a public sentiment which would openly declare for total abstinence, prohibition, and public officials known to be temperance men in every sense of the word. After the two political parties had held their nominating conventions for local officers, we appointed a committee to interview the candidates and find out if there were enough pronounced prohibitionists to consolidate a ticket, for which we could consistently and legitimately work. To this end we intended to have a free lunch and hot coffee along with our tickets, at all the voting precincts in the city on the day of election. Our interviews with the different candidates, decided for us that we could have nothto do with either ticket. We then decided to be on hand at the polls, irrespective of ticket, with our lunch stands, and instead of having it free, to charge a small sum and thereby increase our revenue. We talked temperance all day, expressing at the same time our sorrow and humiliation over the fact that we could do nothing else but talk. The very fact that we took our attitude boldly, and unflinchingly interviewed the men who want to hold public office, and went to the polls in the face of threats and intimidations, has caused a ripple of excitement and thought that will not cease until a great wave of temperance power shall be felt and feared in our town. Already men are coming out from under the party lash, and declaring that party lines shall govern them no more. Two of our ladies volunteered to go to to the second ward precinct, which is known in political parlance as the "Bloody Second," it having become notorious, not only for its saloon power and great hostility to the temperance cause, but because it originates and controls the party tickets. It was said the ladies would be insulted and obliged to witness disgraceful rows etc., if they went. They went and stayed, until the polls were closed and it was fully dark. They were rewarded by being told by the police and many others, that such an election in that ward had never before been known, as good order and gentlemanly conduct prevailed all day. The ladies were liberally patronized and treated with perfect respect in every way. Many said to them, "This is the best thing the ladies of Sedalia have ever done." The police said, "Ladies you have helped me to keep order and sobriety here, today." We did well financially also. Our receipts for this year, so far have reached nearly two hundred dollars. Shall we not take heart, and be encouraged to take two steps at a time instead of one in the future?

Brookfield.—The W. C. T. U. of the second congressional district of Missouri met in convention in this city April 3 and 4. At the last moment news reached us that our beloved state president was dangerously ill and could not be with us. Of course we had depended entirely upon her for wisdom and instruction to make our convention a success, but God who teaches us all 'not to lean on the arm of flesh,' when we had done all we could came to our rescue and sent us Mrs. Dr. Watkins, of Cameron, who by her wisdom and great ability enabled us to carry out all our plans. Miss Mary Burnham was unanimously elected district president, and Mrs. Groenendyke, secretary.

Many able papers were read, many interesting discussions and suggestions made, and much inspiration gained encouraging us to press forward with greater zeal than ever before in this great work of putting down the enemy—alcohol. And although Missouri is still a baby in this great work, we commenced to walk on the day of our birth, and now the strides we take astonish ourselves, and we predict that in the near future Missouri will rank among the prohibition states.

Mrs. M. E. McDill, Cor. Sec.

Mt. Vernon.—Mr. J. Critchfield came to Mt. Vernon the 22d of last month and lectured five evenings successively. We consider him the "right man in the right place." Mrs. Clardy was with us a few weeks ago. Is an able, energetic worker.

Our W. C. T. U. has a membership of forty-nine but only a "faithful few" attend the weekly meetings. We expect soon to open a reading room and thereby increase the interest of our citizens in our cause. But with an undaunted spirit through trials that we daily meet we will ever work for "God, home, and native land."

S. Peden, Cor. Sec.

Kirksville.—The temperance ticket was victorious in Kirksville. Mr. George Woodford lectured for and worked with us for the last eight days and nights preceding the election, and there is no doubt that the efficient work done by him during that time, the work done by our W. C. T. U., with the assistance of 300 of your "No License Leaflets," were all powerful agents in bringing about the above named result. We are not, however, "resting on our oars," for we know that the enemy is not conquered, that the effect of the opiate administered last Tuesday will soon wear off, and they will arise with the additional vigor which rest imparts to mind and body.

The value of Mr. Woodford's lectures to our W. C. T. U., to the students of the State Normal School located here, and to every one who heard him is incalculable. Over 400 signed the pledge, beside the children, which he helped organize into a Band of Hope, numbering nearly 200.

Our district convention (the first) will be held in Macon May 14 and 15. It is yet unorganized, but our brave state corresponding secretary, Rose Phillips, aided by two or three local corresponding secretaries, is making strong efforts to have at least one W. C. T. U. in each county in the district before the convention.

We are very sorrowful over the serious illness of dear Mrs. Hoffman. She is a noble, grand woman, and is a mighty tower of strength to our state, which we can illy spare even for a short time, and believing that "He doeth all things well," we trust it will not be long ere she is again able to assist us in our work "for God and home and native land."

MISSOURI NEWS.

A quiet but powerful agent has been set to work in Newton, Barry and Lawrence counties of southwest Missouri. Where it was impracticable to organize a W. C. T. U. auxiliary to the state, the ladies have formed prayer circles, to meet once a week. The exercises are opened with a hymn and prayer, followed by Bible reading, brief prayers and testimony. The last twenty minutes of the hour are devoted to the discussion of a topic which is to be named by the president and a lady appointed to lead in a five minutes' talk and others are to offer also their best thoughts on the same. The appointment of the topic and leader for the next meeting, and the singing of a hymn and prayer closes the exercises. These societies have president, secretary and treasurer, and an agent for The Union Signal. It is expected that they will soon be strong enough to become auxiliary to the state W. C. T. U. Some of them have already started Bands of Hope. Seneca, Verona, Aurora, Purdy, Washburn and Seligman have organized since the last of February. I have been permitted to organize unions in Newtonia, Neosho, Richey, Exeter, and Y. W. C. T. Unions in Pierce City, Carterville, Carljune, during this winter and spring and visited several of the older unions to instruct the ladies more fully in the duties of officers and members.

The ladies of Carthage have not ceased their labors with the election of a temperance ticket in their growing city. They are now preparing for a district convention to be held there on April 21, 22, 23. The program is arranged for the instruction of workers after the style of a teacher's institute. Mr. George Woodford did a noble work for us here.

Mrs. S. S. Riley, county organizer of Jaspar county, formed a W. C. T. U. of twenty-seven members at Galesburg on the 30th of March.

Mrs. Hoffman returned to Kansas City on the first of April very sick, from exposure while in the lecture field. It is hoped that a few weeks will restore her to her favorite toils.

Mary M. Clardy.

DELAWARE.

Wilmington.—The month of March was a continued feast of good things along the line of temperance work, for we have been honored with visits from three of our national superintendents, Mrs. J. Ellen Foster, Miss Jennie Smith, and Miss Mary C. McClees, each one doing faithful service for the cause we love.

The first to come was Mrs. Foster, on the ninth of the month. How gladly we welcomed her, for this event had been looked forward to with more than ordinary interest as the meeting she addressed was the temperance anniversary of the annual M. E. conference of our peninsula; and the first on record held under the auspices of our W. C. T. U. Our opera house, seating some 1,400 people, was packed, standing room being in demand. The day was stormy, else hundreds would have been turned away. It is impossible to report the address, which was full of convincing argument and proof. The testimony of many of the ministers was, "It was the jewel of the conference."

The next in order was Miss McClees with her "Kitchen garden" lore and enthusiasm. For a week she met daily with a class of young ladies from our Y. W. C. T. U. and duly instructed us in the mysteries of household work, so that we could teach others. Our plan is to form a paid class at once and endeavor to prepare them for an exhibition to be given in June, and in the fall to begin with our mission work.

Even while Miss McClees was in our city, our national railroad superintendent came. Miss Jennie Smith's "concern" was for the "railroad men" and though but little time was given to make arrangements a mass meeting was held in a church near the station, and quite a number of the employes were in attendance. A precious seal to this meeting was the conversion of one of the "freight brakemen" and Miss Jennie felt this to be a beginning of that for which she had so long prayed—an entrance along the line of the Penn. R. R.

Now a word for the "Home Guards." The reading room under the care of our Y. W. C. T. U. which has been open for the past thirteen months, had to change habitation. The new quarters were made attractive by fresh paint and paper, and the numerous "pretty things" which loving, prayerful hearts arranged. When "all was ready, the guests were bidden." A musical program was most attractively carried out, and earnest words spoken by the pastors present. The New Year opens most encouragingly, as our expenses are all provided for twelve months ahead and we are praying that souls may be won for the Master.

Only last evening the "Western Reading Room" under the care of the W. C. T. U., was opened and word comes, "some thirty-five or forty present."

Our union, No. 2, continues its onward march. Since Mrs. Harper was here in February, another mass meeting has been held where earnest addresses were made by the ministers and others interested, and the result is a number of new names and enlightened sentiment.

With so many "irons in the fire,"—reading room, temperance school and kitchen garden—our treasury needed attention. Hearing of Miss Jessie Couthoui, of Chicago, we made an engagement with her for March 29, and gave an entertainment in one of our Sunday school halls. Miss Couthoui is a most gifted elocutionist, and helped fill our pocket!

Enough of one month's work. May the Lord keep us earnest and true.

FIRST DISTRICT CONVENTION.

The first convention of the first judicial district met at Beatrice, Gage county, on Thursday, March 27, Mrs. Ford, state president, in the chair.

At the close of the devotional exercises "Methods of Work" were discussed very freely and with much interest.

The devotional exercises of the afternoon session were led by Rev. E. D. Berwick, of the Baptist church. The address of welcome was given by Mrs. Hardy, president of Beatrice. Response by Mrs. Ford, followed by an address by Rev. Mr. Roberts of the M. E. church. A violent storm of thunder, lightning and wind interrupted the meeting at this point.

At the evening session an address was given by Mrs. DeLong upon "Modern Prophets and Prophesyings," which was listened to with marked attention by the audience.

Friday morning session opened with devotional exercises led by Mrs. De Long, of Tecumseh, district president, after which came an earnest, timely, concise, and instructive paper by Miss Helena Janson on juvenile work. Miss Janson is the leader of the Band of Hope and has very exalted and truthful ideas of her work.

The election of officers Friday afternoon resulted in the choice of Mrs. De Long, of Tecumseh, for president, Miss Helena Jansen, corresponding secretary, Mrs. Fulton, of Pawnee, treasurer.

Time having arrived for the children's meeting Mrs. Cooley gave them a little speech of half an hour in length brim full of fun and pathos, in which she tried to impress upon their minds the fact that the present moment is the all important factor in their lives. "God can't make yesterday tomorrow," therefore they should act truthfully, wisely and well today.

Mrs. Ford made a plea for scientific instruction and also for temperance literature in our public schools. Mrs. Cooley presented the claims of The Union Signal.

At the evening session the following toasts were given with appropriate responses: "Temperance and the Church," "Temperance and the Press," "The Ladies of the Beatrice W. C. T. U.," "Temperance in the Old World and the New," "The Great Evil of the Country and its Remedy," "For God and Home and Native Land."

At the close of the exercises coffee and cake were served and all spent a pleasant hour in social intercourse.

Thus closed the first district convention of the first judicial district. Delegates and friends separated on Saturday morning feeling that it had been good to be there.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

REPORT OF SUPERINTENDENT OF HYGIENE.

WASHINGTON.—We began our work with parlor meetings, and month after month from three to five women went from house to house doing "Zenana work" in this gospel of health. Finally E. Washington union gave us their regular meeting, and we had our first lecture.

Mrs. Spafford, of the Riggs House, tendered us the Red Parlors, and Mrs. Bovee her parlors. We thankfully accepted them and divided our work as follows:

Cooking, bathing, exercise, dress, adulteration of food, sleep, rest, society, and assigned these to different ladies for essays. Exercise came in practically through the class described below.

Providentially a stranger from Norway, instructor in the German gymnasium, on being informed of the W. C. T. U. labors of love, cheerfully consented to donate one term of free instruction to our girls. Many teachers of the public schools joined the class, among whom we distributed one hundred sample copies of THE UNION SIGNAL. A reception was given the instructor, Prof. Nissen, at his hall, to which all the teachers were invited guests. Several hundred were present.

Addresses were given, showing the benefits of light gymnastics by Prof. Nisson, Supt. J. N. Wilson, Principal Coff of Franklin building, (to the two last named gentlemen we are indebted for a hall in that building free of charge for our class,) Miss Smith, principal of the Normal, who came with her entire school into the gymnastic class, Dr. Hausman and Dr. Reyburn.

We hope ere long to call our National superintendents of Hygiene, Heredity and Social Science to come over to Macedonia and help us.

A gymnasium is now permanent in the Franklin building, and we hope others will follow this one. Our labors have been blessed abundantly.

Mrs. Bovee's Turkish bath is overrun with bathers. The school teachers are training pupils more each day in exercises, and now the way is clear before us, ere long to have a successful institute, during this session of congress, when its instructions will radiate from the capital to the remote states and territories.

MRS. MARY E. MCPHERSON, Supt. Dept. Hygiene.

INDIANA.

SIXTH DISTRICT CONVENTION.

The semi-annual convention of this district was held at Muncie April 8 and 9. Mrs. M. L. Wells state president, Miss Amanda Way state vice president, Mrs. Brookbank of Jeffersonville, Rev. J. A. Pollock of Spiceland, Mr. B. F. Ham of Richmond, and Mrs. S. A. R. Boor of New Castle, district president, together with a large number of delegates were present. The reports from the unions were very encouraging. Some of them reported very aggressive work done.

The evening session was addressed by the Rev. J. A. Pollock, subject "Prohibition the Question of the Day," giving its history eloquently though briefly from the Bible days to the present time. The second day was devoted largely to business, a paper was read by Dr. Rachel Bailey of Spiceland, on "The Signs of the Times," which was freely discussed. At 11 o'clock B. F. Ham of the Dunn temperance club of Richmond, gave an account of the work done in that place by James Dunn, and still carried on by the reformed men co-operating with the business men. Our officers and many other temperance workers availed themselves of the many opportunities offered them in the interim of business to speak words of cheer and to point out the great work which should be accomplished by the people of Indiana this campaign year. The evening session was addressed by Mrs. M. L. Wells. She spoke of woman's work and influence, of her ability to combine her home duties with something for the good of others, of the members of the union in politics, of the right that they have to be heard. The speech was lengthy and very interesting, embracing children's work and scientific instruction in the schools. Miss Way followed in a most interesting talk on the general questions embraced in the subject. The exercises of the convention were interspersed throughout with music by our sweet singer, Mrs. Brookbank. We were gladly received and royally entertained by the sisters of Muncie. All went out from that convention greatly strengthened and with our armor girded more closely than ever before each one resolved to work and pray that the victory in Indiana may be ours this year.

NEW YORK.

CATTARAUGUS COUNTY CONVENTION.

The semi-annual session of the county W. C. T. U. met at Cattaraugus April 8. There are eight local unions in the county. Delegates' reports were very interesting and favorable. Among the more pleasing of the committee reports was the one given by Mrs. P. M. Orne, on unfermented wine. She reported that but very few churches in the county, where unions were established, used fermented wine at the communion table.

Excellent papers were presented upon "The Temperance Outlook," and "What is to come of it all."

The addresses by Mrs. Lytie P. Danes of Alleghany and Miss Blanche Heazlett, of Sherman, were able and eloquent.

One of the oldest unions in the county is the one at Versailles—the dusky sisters of the forest on the reservation. We hope the more civilized women of the county will not allow these to lead in human reformation.

CANISTEO.—Our W. C. T. U. was organized one year ago. It has now about fifty members. We meet weekly and hold union public meetings monthly, usually conducted by the pastors of the churches. Our last public meeting was conducted by the members of the union, and papers were read on "Temperance and Hygiene in our Schools," "The Relation of Prayer to Our Work," "What Shall We do with Our Boys?" "The Needs of the Present Hour." Select readings and recitations were also given interspersed with singing.

At our last election for excise commissioner the union prepared a free dinner for the temperance voters, distributed tracts, circulated the pledge, talked temperance and prohibition, and encouraged the temperance voters throughout the day by prayer and singing in rooms procured near the place of voting. The effect of these religious exercises was acknowledged by many to be impressive, and the result was the election of a thoroughgoing temperance man for the excise board. It is wonderful how much women with consecrated hearts can do to help along the work.

MRS. J. HENDRICK.

COLORADO.

FIRST DISTRICT CONVENTION.

The first district met in convention in the Baptist church of Greeley, March 20, at 7:30 p. m. Mrs. Shields and other delegates arrived early in the afternoon, and so the sleet and snow thunder storm that just preceded our opening service, failed to discourage or chill our zeal. The well filled table of rare and beautiful flowers to the right of the desk was in strong contrast to the falling snow that continued all through the following day. An address of welcome was given by Mrs. W. S. Annis, president. Response by Mrs. Mary Shields in her own earnest and impressive manner.

An able and instructive essay was then read by Mrs. Rev. H. F. Wallace, on prohibition, followed by an address by Mr. Luther Kauffman, a lawyer of this place, upon the same timely and inexhaustible subject. Both were listened to with increasing interest by a small but appreciative audience.

Friday, at 9:30, the devotional exercises were conducted by Mrs. Shields. The different departments of work in the Denver union were reported to the edification and great encouragment of all present. Loveland union gave no uncertain sound and has since spoken in thunder tones by electing a close no-license ticket.

Greeley union reported favorably financially and in work especially among inmates of our jail, and convicts sent to state penitentiary during fall months.

On account of the storm Ft. Collins and other places failed to report, but as never before the u ions all about us are arming for the "irrepressible conflict" with the foe of all foes and for prohibition, the alpha and omega of the temperance alphabet.

At the evening session Prof. Copland, gave briefly his method of teaching temperance in the different departments of his school. Tnen the best of the feast came last, in Mrs. Shields' intensely interesting but all too short address.

WISCONSIN

MAIDEN ROCK.—Sailing up Lake Pepin the tourist's attention is specially attracted toward one bluff towering skyward in its lofty grandeur, and the old Dakota legend, story of Winona, "Red Wing's winsome eldest daughter," gives it both a fame and a name—Maiden Rock.

In the early spring time every rock forms a waterfall, and it has been laughingly said, "Nothing can ever be made of it but a cold water town." But a licensed saloon and a licensed drug store have poured forth such a resistless tide of iniquity as to threaten the foundation of many a peaceful, happy home.

Wives and mothers watched and pondered, and on the 13th day of February ten of the most deeply moved organized a local union. We voted to hold weekly private and monthly public meetings. With an energy and promptness that almost took our breath, our presiden set about a public meeting. This meeting inaugurated a regular siege or bombardment of the enemy's forces. The pastors of the churches held union meetings and by earnest, effectual preaching enthused the public mind.

With faith in the prophecy "And a little child shall lead them," a Sunday school temperance concert carried its weight of influence, and the responsive readings, recitations and songs of the little ones were both entertaining and profitable. Sabbath morning before election, a Swede minister was sent out to work with the Scandinavian population, and representatives of the liquor party with kegs of beer followed to work up their own unrighteous cause, and there were anxious hearts, not knowing whether the messenger of the gospel of peace, or the emissaries of evil should return jubilant, but Monday morning brought this report, "I think my people all go as one man for temperance." And so they did, and election day was a day of triumph to our just and holy cause.

TEXAS.

EVERY DAY DOINGS.

DALLAS.—Addressed a good sized audience of thoughtful people here. Am in the home of Mrs. Ada B. Hetherington, a dear woman whose presence is peace giving and whose hands delight in the bestowment of blessings. Upon leaving the church I heard a woman say to her, "Who has been sending out temperance tracts in this city, one of which came to me and did me precious good?" Women of the W. C. T. U., listen to the reply! "I sold four favorite hens and invested the proceeds in temperance tracts for distribution." God bless the little woman, and multiply her number! Reorganized the W. C. T. U. here upon a good basis of ability and determination. We expect a good work at its hands.

ALVARADO.—A crowded house repeated the common testimony that the people are everywhere in waiting to hear a presentation of the truth, and its hearty acceptation is evidence that they are also ready for action.

CLEBURNE.—A large and prosperous W. C. T. U. here under the lead of Mrs. Musson whose force and push bring mighty things to pass. She is grandly supported by Mr. and Mrs. F. A. Foster in whose ideal home I find refreshing for body and spirit.

FT. WORTH.—This is in verity "The Chicago of Texas," a city of magnificent saloons. But these words of the Christ come to me, "Seest thou these great buildings? There shall not be left here one stone upon another, which shall not be thrown down."

CEDAR COUNTY CONVENTION.

The first convention of the W. C. T. U. of Cedar county was held in Clarence April 3 and 4. The sessions were all well attended and much interest manifested by those outside the unions, as well as the members. Two unions only were represented owing to sickness and bad condition of the roads. Mrs. Aldrich our state president was present assisting us greatly by her wise and timely counsel in every department of our work.

Thursday evening the large audience was nicely entertained by an address of welcome by Miss E. Frink, of Clarence. Mrs. Aldrich responded in behalf of the convention. An excellent address by Mrs. Aldrich on the origin and progress of temperance work, closed the evening exercises.

Friday was a busy day, in the way of business, plans of work, discussions, etc. In the evening the audience listened with much attention to a well rendered recitation by Miss Helen Fergerson. Also a very able temperance lecture by Rev. E. May, of Tipton.

TRIBUTE OF RESPECT.

The undersigned, appointed by the W. C. T. U. of Forrest City, to offer a fitting tribute to the memory of of our sister and co-worker, Miss P. B. Newman, respectfully submit:

That in her death the W. C. T. U. have lost one of the most efficient and capable of its officers and members; our public library an earnest, zealous supporter; society an accomplished member; her family one of its most cherished idols; and humanity, an exemplar of Christianity. Always bright, cheerful, winning, and sympathetic, a devoted sister, a true friend, an untiring worker in the cause of temperance, to which she gave five years of her life, generous, charitable, kindly. Throughout the years of her affliction she bore the white flower of a stainless life, and we feel with her family that her loss is irreparable.

MRS. O. B. ROLLWAYE,
MRS. V. B. IZARD,
MRS. W. L. THOMPSON.

WEST VIRGINIA NOTES.

Unions have been formed during the last month in Huntington, Charleston, Weston, Harrisville and Grafton, (the union of Grafton is a Y. W. C. T. U.) and Bands of Hope in Grafton and Ravenswood.

Our state W. C. T. U. convention meets June 17 and 18 in Parkersburg, in conjunction with the state temperance convention. Miss Willard will be with us, also Mrs. M. L. Wells, president Indiana W. C. T. U. The latter will spend the entire month of June in West Virginia lecturing and organizing.

MRS. I. H. JOHNSON.

KANSAS.

HUMBOLDT.—When we organized the 19th of January, last, there were three open saloons in our little city of two thousand inhabitants and there was more drinking and gambling than is usually found in so small a town. The worst feature was, there were so many boys who were enticed and being taught both to drink and gamble. There were perhaps twenty ladies who worked actively, assisted by the clergy generally, and also by the temperance men of the place. In two weeks the city had been canvassed by visiting committees, going from house to house with the pledge and subscription paper; $250 was raised and a membership of sixty secured.

Evidence against saloon keepers was easily obtained, but we found that men who had been esteemed as truthful, when put to the test, would not tell the truth. However the saloon keepers were at last convicted. One of the three left the place in fear, and the two that remained were given the same terms, viz.: the payment of $400 each and a bond of $2 000, with nine counts, with perfect testimony left hanging over them, so that now we can say there is no open saloon in our city. But our work is not finished. Drug stores are to be looked after now. Our union offered through our county attorney a reward of $25 for testimony that would convict "druggists or any person selling alcoholic liquors."

We are keeping the subject before the people in the way of musical and literary entertainments and lectures. Charging no admittance fee. Last week Mrs. Laura G. Fixen gave us her lecture, "The Ink Bottle, versus the Whisky Jug." Now we are unanimously and enthusiastically at work circulating "The Memorial of the Home." We also distribute tracts at our elections and public meetings, and although we sometimes meet with rebuffs we feel equal to the conflict for our cause is righteous. MRS. L. A. GARRETT, Cor. Sec.

ILLINOIS.

TWELFTH DISTRICT CONVENTION.

A convention of the 12th district was held at Jerseyville, March 12 and 13. Gratifying reports were sent from most of the unions unrepresented, of progress and increasing membership, especially in young women's and juvenile work. A new feature was the presence of the full quota of delegates from the Winchester Y. W. C. T. U. rejoicing our hearts, and giving us a new inspiration, and I might say a dispensation for more earnest work, as practical work was ingrained into every exercise.

Even the charming addresses of welcome by Dr. Enos, Jun., and Mrs. S. C. Enos, foreshadowed the eminently practical turn of the entire convention. Ample time was given on the program for the consideration of our growing young woman's work, which was so well improved by our champion, Miss Mattie Yates, as to result in the organization by her of another Y. W. C. T. U. now numbering nearly one hundred in its membership. The W. C. T. U. also was greatly strengthened and encouraged by many accessions to its numbers, of both active and honorary members.

A full table of temperance literature, a gift from headquarters, (the corresponding secretary says it is rather a result of having a state literature fund,) superadded to a bountiful supply, purchased by means of the district fund, of Miss Julia Colman, was another practical feature, and the scattering of those blessed leaves, which are for the healing of the nations and the increasing list of subscriptions for THE UNION SIGNAL, which had its early allotted place, must tell for the grand advance of noble Christian temperance sentiment.

The report of our financial secretary, Mrs. Read, was cheering. If the worthy example of the W. C. T. U. of Payson, be imitated, all doubts in the matter will vanish. Being informed of their appointment, though numbering few, they accepted the same and started out with their subscription paper, and in a few weeks, sent in the full amount, $60, saying they might readily have made it $100, had we asked it. Our new union at Columbus voluntarily sent in a gift of $10.

The sessions of the convention were well attended by gentlemen as well as ladies, especially in the evenings. The pastors gave us their kindly aid and presence, and all acknowledge themselves benefited by the coming of the convention.

On our homeward way we organized strong unions at Kane and Greenfield. The first in Green county. There are no saloons in either place, but work is needed and promised, especially among the young people and children. IRENE H. SMITH.

SEVENTH DISTRICT CONVENTION.

The W. C. T. U. of the 7th district met in annual convention at Princeton April 2 and 3. A great amount of work was crowded into the three half-day sessions, and yet it was all well done. All the unions in the district except one reported, showing a deep interest in the work, and much hope is entertained of the final triumph of right over wrong.

The address welcoming the delegates was delivered by Mrs. Helen Hodgman and responded to by Mrs. Mary B. Willard. A number of interesting papers, bearing upon our work were read. Mrs. J. W. Davis of Buda, showed the powerful influence wielded by women.

Mrs. M. E. Holmes of Galva, gave good and sufficient reasons for women desiring the elective franchise. Mrs. S. E. Huff, of Sterling, advocated district meetings, enumerating many benefits arising therefrom, and Miss Ada Morris answered the question "What can we do?" in a very satisfactory manner.

The report presented by committee on plan of work, based on the national and state plans, was accepted. It was recommended that the district raise the annual sum of $800, $300 of which is to be devoted to state work and $500 to be paid as a salary to the district president or organizer, who shall go into unoccupied territory and also assist the unions already organized to carry on our many lines of work intelligently.

The meeting on Wednesday evening was addressed by Mrs. Willard, and on Thursday evening by Miss West, both of whom were listened to with profound attention by an appreciative audience.

The election of officers for the district resulted as follows, the vote being unanimous: President, Mrs. Mingle, of Amboy; secretary, Miss Olds, of Galva; treasurer, Mrs. C. P. Miller, of Amboy, and financial secretary, Mrs. Benedict, of Princeton. ONE WHO WAS THERE.

MORE ELECTION NEWS.

LANARK.—Another boom for Lanark, election held April 15, gave a majority in the board of five to one, for no license. The Lord be praised for this victory over the saloon curse for another year.

LEWISTON.—Our no license majority was 166 in a total vote of 387. It is a scorching condemnation of high license. Fulton county is again freed from saloons. Its twelve incorporated cities, towns and villages have all held their annual elections, and each one has declared against license.

WASHBURN.—After a "twenty years' drunk" our town is sobering up. The victory was gained mainly through the efforts of the W. C. T. U. One of our saloon keepers voted the temperance ticket. The license people are very angry. One man says: "Dese vimmen's union demperance haf done it."

FRANKLIN GROVE.—At the village election not one vote was polled for license, in fact there was not one candidate for whisky, though last year we had a license board.

PECATONICA.—The ladies of the union at this place were on hand with coffee and lunch, election day, ready to encourage and hold up the hands of our brothers at the polls wishing the while that we had the power to say whether it should be "license," or "no license;" we would make short work of it. A warm contest was followed by a no license victory with a majority of sixteen; which was due in a large measure to the frithful efforts of two of our ministers who labored at the polls all day.

DECATUR.—The W. C. T. U. feel that they owe much to the labors of Mrs. Lucy Simpson and the addresses of Gov. St. John for the glorious victory on April 15, which will close up twenty-six saloons. The union itself is full of good works, keeping up regular weekly meetings, gospel services, monthly socials and a dining hall. The Y. W. C. T. U. is alike active and earnest.

GIRARD.—Our election came off Tuesday, April 22, and so did our prayer meeting. We had a glorious prayer meeting and God heard our prayer, for the temperance party elected two out of the three candidates for alderman.

EUREKA.—The election came and went, and with it went the saloons from our village, polled out by 177 of our good men. The opposition numbered 107. Last year license was three ahead. One is the result of temperance agitation, blessed of God; the other temperance stagnation, all unblessed. E. J. D.

ILLINOIS NOTES.

—A union has been organized by Mrs. M. C. Morrison, at Nashville. Mrs. Morrison is now organizer of the 18th district and will soon be out in the field engaged in active work.

—Miss Mary Pratt, organizer of Vermillion county, 15th district, is now at work organizing, and reports a new union at Goodwin.

—Mrs. Louise H. Rounds, one of the ablest speakers and workers of our W. C. T. U., will be in the state on May 1. Mrs. Rounds has been from the first identified in the work and her coming into the state gives us a most valuable worker. Send to headquarters, 161 La Salle st., for terms and dates.

—A Y. W. C. T. U. was organized at Collinsville, in the eighteenth district, by Miss Hood and Miss Anna Nisbet, of Alton, during the recent district convention held there.

—Miss Emily Shedd the new president of the ninth district has taken hold of her work most energetically and is meeting with well merited success. She has recently organized a union at Milford, and Bands of Hope at Wellington, Crescent City, and Ashkum. Other unions have been visited, public meetings held and large additions to the membership gained.

—The W. C. T. U. of Freeport is greatly cheered by the result of Francis Murphy's work, and that of his son, Thos. E. Murphy, in that city. Over 2,000 have donned the "bonnie bit of blue." A Y. W. C. T. U. has been organized and many new members gained for the W. C. U. T. The sixth district executive session held in Freeport April 10, was most enjoyable and profitable. Most encouraging reports were given of the work throughout the district and the plans adopted promise vigorous work for the remainder of the year.

NEWS IN A NUTSHELL.

THE Port Townsend (W. T.) W. C. T. U. are about to establish a reading room and library to be open to the general public.

THE North Side Y. W. C. T. U. of Chicago have offered a prize to the pupils of the Lake View high school for the best essay on temperance.

A NEW Chalk Talker is in the field. It is Mrs. E. A. Blair, of Wisconsin, who delighted an opera house full of children at Carthage, Mo., last week.

THE eighth Y. W. C. T. U. of the District of Columbia was recently organized at the Metropolitan church. Miss Susan B. Anthony addressed the meeting.

MRS. LAURA G. FIXEN addressed a large and attentive audience in Jewett, Texas, April 11. Much enthusiasm prevails. A temperance boom has been inaugurated.

CAPTAIN LINSCOTT has just finished a good work at Hillsboro, and has made engagements for Maroa, Litchfield and Lebanon. The secretary writes in terms of highest commendation.

EFFORTS are being made to open a coffee house and reading room in Modesto, Cal., for the use of harvest hands and other young men. They have a flourishing Band of Hope in Modesto.

IT is expected that Francis Murphy will commence work in this city at Park avenue M. E. church on the 4th inst. It is earnestly hoped that a glorious gospel temperance revival may result from his efforts.

MRS. M. G. LEAVITT is being most cordially received in Oregon. Astoria, St. Helen's, Salem and Portland have already been blessed by her presence. She is now up the Willamette Valley and will make a general tour of the state.

MRS M. E. BALCH, of Frankfort, Ind., has been spending some time in juvenile work in the ninth district of Illinois, and the president reports a new impetus given the work by her chalk talks which attracted and pleased all.

A COMMITTEE from the Colfax (Wash. Ter.) W. C. T. U. canvassed the town, house by house, and secured the registration of nearly every woman voter. Of the 125 ladies registered there is not one in twenty but what is in favor of prohibition.

THE Temperance Worker of Columbia, S. C., is enlarging its capacity to take in the W. C. T. U. work as well as Good Templars and Sons of Temperance. It is a live weekly, managed jointly by these organizations, and only sixty cents per annum.

MRS. MARY M. CLARDY, after an illness of six weeks, is again in the field in Missouri organizing unions and strengthening the work in all Christian ways. Not every woman of the first half of the century would feel her strength equal to such tasks.

THE W. C. T. Unions of Colorado have kindled a fire that bids fair to burn until the saloons are closed out. The political pot is boiling and steaming till the thin air of the highlands is dense with its clouds. The issue is prohibition versus license.

THE tenth annual children's flower show and fete is to be held in the Royal Agricultural hall and grounds, Ball's Bridge, Dublin, June 27. Every effort is being made to make this great gathering a grand succes. Special excursion trains will run from all parts of the country at reduced fares.

THE W. C. T. U. of Watertown, N. Y., was organized less than three months ago and already numbers one hundred members of the most cultivated ladies of the town. The first work undertaken by this new union was a kitchen garden. A beautiful room has been rented for the purpose, and money for this special work raised.

THE Twenty-second street W. C. T. U. of Chicago, Mrs. M. A. Cummings, president, has issued its annual report showing a membership of seventy and an expenditure of $1,333 in Mission work and industrial school, several Bands of Hope, and two kindergartens. The society is doing good work in distributing temperance literature, over 16,000 tracts and leaflets having been circulated on horse cars, in hotels and boarding houses.

THE W. C. T. U. of Montreal have issued their annual report in a neat and tasteful pamphlet, showing excellent work for the year. Among many items is the fact that through the efforts of this society the Protestant board of school commissioners has adopted Dr. Richardson's Temperance Lessons as text book for the city schools. Prizes have been offered for the best essays on the subject of temperance also, and pledges administered to a large number of drinkers.

FLOURISHING kitchen gardens are carried on by the unions in Manistee and Detroit, Mich. Mrs. Wheeler writes from Manistee: "So many more children apply than can be received that I had to turn them from the door crying. I could have cried myself for their disappointment." "In St. Paul," writes Miss McClees, "several society belles have been drawn into the Y. W. C. T. U., and in Detroit I met several young ladies who told me nothing would have induced them to sign the pledge but that they wanted to take part in the kitchen gardens.

FLOWER MISSIONS.

DEAR SUPERINTENDENTS OF FLOWER MISSIONS.—The suggestion that the Flower Mission work be allowed space in THE UNION SIGNAL is a good one. Being a new branch, we may thus become a "mutual aid" society, and by an interchange of ideas and plans unify and systematize our work, thereby increasing its efficiency.

In the states thoroughly organized the machinery will run with ease. Alas, for those in the condition of Kentucky! With money, influence and sentiment arrayed against us, we should be discouraged, did we not remember that "the battle is not to the strong." Though "the odds" seem against us, yet with the faith of David, we go forth trusting, knowing that "the battle is the Lord's" and He will take care of His forces.

As to the plans we hope to carry out in Kentucky: I will state them as briefly as possible. I have sent my circular, with the circular prepared for general use, and a personal letter giving plain, practical directions, defining the work minutely to the unio s throughout the state. I ask to have these placed in the hands of a committee that will devote a few hours each week, or at least every two weeks to this work. I urge that the jails, workhouses, almshouses, hospitals, all reformatories, and the neglected and lowly homes shall receive regular visits: the committee to be equipped with bouquets, "containing something white, something bright and something sweet," with an appropriate text card attached; carefully selected literature, temperance leaflets, religious newpapers and pledge cards to be used when necessary. These with a word of sympathy and encouragement fitly spoken, a prayer either silent or uttered, will win our way to the most callous and indifferent heart and lift its thoughts to higher and better things. In this ministry we are seeking to save souls. God speaks to us through these beautiful blossoms, and with them as "the thin edge of a wedge, we can rive the stoutest oak."

Just now "Prison day" begins to loom up and assume formidable proportions. Everything is being put in order by our National superintendent, Miss Jennie Casseday, and the complicated wheels must keep in harmonious motion.

Each state superintendent will receive general instructions. About the details we are left to ourselves. I offer my plans and hope to receive from you many suggestions that will aid me in perfecting them. I have thought it would be well, where practicable, to have each union send to the penitentiary on that day two representatives, the president and chairman of the committee of Flower Missions. By being present an index of the necessity for the work, and the benefits resulting, would be received, that could be conveyed in no other way; an interest awakened and plans developed that would be helpful to those having charge of this branch of our cause. All railroads will certainly permit half fare rates, and the expenses will be small.

Our Prison is located at Frankfort, our capital. As superintendent, I shall not neglect sending invitations to the governor, state officers and prominent citizens of the capital, to be present at the exercises, that they may see the work is a practical one, and not a mere sentiment. If possible I shall procure the services of a fine singer, who will sing one or two solos and thus make the program more attractive. For the benefits of the local W. C. T. U., I hope a reception, festival, or social of some kind will be held at the close of the day, which the committee from other unions may attend, and thereby be enabled to learn methods for similar entertainments at home. These are all helpful and tend to strengthen and confirm our workers. The proceeds can be kept for local use, or divided with the state if deemed advisable.

As the 9th of June comes on Monday this year we have decided to request the ministers throughout the state to preach temperance sermons on the 8th, and offer prayers for God's blessing on the work for Monday the 9th. Where churches are favorable to the cause we hope the unions will ask that contributions be taken up for the state work, that we may more vigorously prosecute our organizing.

Our National superintendent, Miss Jennie Casseday, suggests that each state superintendent shall order text cards for use in her own state, and by retailing them to the unions under her charge, will be enabled to realize a few cents, sufficient at least to pay her postage; and then the unions will have purchased them for less than they could be procured elsewhere. The plan is a valuable one, because it furnishes the "one thing needful" to carry on the work.

If these crude plans suggest to any of you "a more perfect way," I trust you will give us the benefit of your ideas.

Yours earnestly,
NANNIE A. MUNNELL,
Supt. of Flower Mission for Ky.
Louisville, Ky., April 18, 1884.

RELATIVE STATISTICS.

As my attention has been called to an item in report of national superintendent of relative statistics, I would explain that as state corresponding secretary I was requested to prepare the report and used to the best of my ability the information which some of the states kindly furnished.

The general statistics were taken from a reliable journal but by some mistake, probably of the printer, the figures were transposed. They should read thus:

Number of drunkards in United States, 600,000; number who die annually, 60,000; number of insane in United States (by census of 1880) 91,997; made so by drink, said to be one-third.

THE wonderful address on "The Delusion of High License" by Rev. Herrick Johnson, D.D., which created much excitement on its delivery before the Temperance Conference in Chicago and which has been the subject of so much criticism in newspaper circles, should be widely circulated in every community. There has been nothing like it written upon the subject. It cannot fail to make temperance sentiment wherever read. It can be obtained at this office in convenient form for distribution at the low price of 30cts PER HUNDRED POSTPAID. Every Local Union should distribute at least 1,000 copies. Persons who have ordered it for their community report to us that they are astounded at the good results. Begin without delay.

AFTER DINNER.

Persons who suffer from Indigestion can arrest the progress of that painful malady by the use of an after-dinner pill, so composed that it will give tone to the stomach, prevent heartburn, rouse the liver to healthful action, invigorate the kidneys, and thus, through the activity of these organs, promote the natural movement of the stomach and bowels. AYER'S PILLS are so compounded that their action, though mild, effectually produces the above results. They also, in curing Constipation, remove the cause of Biliousness, Liver Complaint, Kidney Disease, Rheumatism, and many other serious ailments.

AYER'S PILLS

contain no mineral nor poisonous substance, and do not gripe unless the bowels are irritated, and even then their influence is healing. To continue their effect in constipated or chronic cases, they need only be taken in diminishing instead of increasing doses. For seamen, and inhabitants or travelers in sparsely settled countries where physicians are not at hand, they are of inestimable value. There is hardly a sickness they will not alleviate, and in most cases cure, if taken promptly. To young girls just entering upon womanhood, and to women whose period of maternity is drawing to a close, Ayer's Pills, in moderate doses, merely sufficient to ensure regular action of the bowels, will be found of

BRAIN AND NERVE FOOD.

FROM THE NERVE-GIVING PRINCIPLES OF THE OX-BRAIN and WHEAT GERM.

VITALIZED PHOSPHITES.—Restores the energy lost by nervousness, weakness or indigestion; relieves lassitude and neuralgia; refreshes the nerves tired by worry, excitement or excessive sensitiveness, and strengthens a failing memory. It aids wonderfully in the mental and bodily growth of infants and children. Under its use the teeth come easier, the bones grow better, the skin smoother, the brain acquires more readily and rests and sleeps more sweetly. An ill fed brain learns no lessons, and is excusable if peevish. It gives a more intellectual and happier childhood. It does away with that feeling of weakness and exhaustion which impels to the use of alcoholic beverages, and directly counteracts a cause of depravity and suffering which has baffled the efforts of religion and morality. Not a secret remedy; formula on every label. For sale by Druggists, or mail, $1.

Signal Notes.

In a western town a boy made a murderous assault upon his grandmother. This is an almost inexplicable crime, for the most indulgent friend any boy has is his grandmother. The lad was arrested, and a large number of the citizens have signed a paper denying that he is a bad boy, and attributing the trouble "to too much hard cider, which flew to his head." "O thou invisible spirit of wine (or of hard cider), if thou hast no name to be known by, let us call thee devil!"

The Christian Union makes a comparative showing of the liquor traffic with that in real necessities. In the United States there is annually spent $900,000,000 for liquor, $505,000,000 for bread, $303,000,000 for meat, $290,000,000 for iron and steel, $237,000,000 for sawed lumber. $210 000,000 for cotton goods, $196,000,000 for boots and shoes, $155,000.000 for sugar and molasses, and $85,000,000 for public education. In view of these figures is it to be wondered at that the liquor interest is becoming a powerful factor in politics, controlling legislators and officials?

The moderate smoker uses three cigars per day. This may be taken as an average. These will cost him twenty-five cents. In one year this will amount to $96.25. Now, how many young men are there who can afford to invest $96.25 per year in a useless luxury? And how many fathers of families can well spare so much money annually? Let the young man begin at sixteen and judiciously invest the money in books which his more social friend spends in tobacco. At thirty the value of his books will be more than $1,200. The other young man has burned up his $1,200, and has nothing to show for it, but his nervousness and excitability. He wonders how his more prosperous friend can possibly manage to get so much money to spend for books.—Prof. Hinds.

This is a series of short lessons on alcohol and its action on the body, accompanied with suitable questions, designed for study in public and private schools and reading in schools and families. ## Miscellaneous Selections.

"Where shall we send an intemperate man who wishes to reform?" Often this question comes to us. There may be many good places, but first, Does the guilty man wish to reform? Does he feel guilty or only unfortunate? Does he feel helpless, does he believe in the gospel or divine aid? Is he willing to be placed under Christian influences? If so, then we answer in the affirmative, we can reccommend a place in New York, where we would put an intemperate son, brother, friend, with the greatest hope. It is the Christian Home for Intemperate men, Corner Madison Ave., and 86th street. Its results are wonderful, moral miracles have been wrought there. Write to Supt. Col. Bunting, himself redeemed from liquor drinking and selling as a hotel keeper.

The Cedar Rapids People has the following reference to Mr. James C. Young, of Cedar Rapids, Iowa, a gentleman whom we are pleased to endorse as in every way worthy implicit confidence. Any of our friends desiring to invest in real estate in a large or small way should not hesitate to consult Mr. Young:

"By an application to business rarely excelled, Mr. Young, from nothing, has built up a business which is at once the marvel and surprise of every one. But indomitable energy, quick perception, a keen judgment of human nature, have been the sure means of his success. This year of 1883 he has sold 800 lots and 6,000 acres of land, in which the sales amounted to over a quarter of a million dollars. He is shrewd, and withal perfectly reliable and honorable in all his business transactions. He is an incessant worker and a typical young American, who has pushed through every obstacle and opposition to a place among the real estate men of this western country second to none. His transactions extended over five states and Dakota, having a branch office in Bismarck, the capital of the territory.

"A leading feature of his business is making investments for others, a department to which he has given especial attention. In this last year he has made permanent investments in purchases of over a hundred thousand dollars, half of it in this city for parties living in England, France and the eastern cities who never saw the properties he bought. This alone shows the confidence placed in Mr. Young's ability and integrity by those who know him best."

WITH ESPECIAL REFERENCE TO

ALCOHOLIC DRINKS AND NARCOTICS.

The only Temperance Physiology that Answers fully the Requirements of the new Law in the Several States.

—BY—

J DORMAN STEELE, PH. D.

EDITED AND ENDORSED by the W. C. T. U. under direction of Mrs. MARY H. HUNT.

This work contains all the excellent and popular features that have given Dr. Steele's Fourteen Weeks in Physiology so wide a circulation; with carefully-prepared sections upon the Physiological Action of Alcohol, Tobacco, Opium, etc. These are scattered through the book as each organ is treated. This subject is examined from a purely scientific standpoint, and represents the latest teachings at home and abroad. While there is no attempt to incorporate a temperance lecture in a school book, yet the terrible effects of these "Stimulants and Narcotics," especially upon the young, are set forth all the more impressively, since the lesson is taught merely by the presentation of facts that lean toward no one's prejudices, and admit of no answer or escape. In this edition unusual space is given to the subject of Ventilation, which is now attracting so much attention throughout the country. 300 pages, 12mo., half bound, illustrated. Specimen Copy, postage prepaid, 75 cents.

The Union Signal

OFFICIAL ORGAN OF THE WOMAN'S NATIONAL CHRISTIAN TEMPERANCE UNION.

"Thou hast given a banner to them that fear Thee; that it may be displayed because of the Truth; that Thy beloved may be delivered."

VOL. X.—NO. 19. CHICAGO, MAY 8, 1884. $1 75 PER YEAR.

THERE is a new thing under the sun, and it is a gentleman serving the W. C. T. U. of Charleston, W. Va., as its president. What is more the West Virginia W. C. T. U. proposes to stand by this brave, bachelor brother.

THE New York Witness gives as fact the information that Gen. Joseph Hawley, of Connecticut, the man who stands related to the republican nominating convention of 1884, as Garfield did to the convention of 1880, is a total abstainer and a temperance lecturer. It is also known of him that he dared to vote against the Chinese bill, and closed the Centennial Exhibition on Sunday. His father was known in the early days of reform in this country as an unflinching, heroic advocate of freedom and equal rights. If the son be like unto him, the republicanism that was once based on a platform of "moral ideas" could give no surer manifestation of a return to its first love, than his nomination.

SAID an old lady to one of her co-workers as they were leaving the regular meeting of the local union the other day, "What is it, this tact, that Mrs. A. and Mrs. B. and Mrs. C. are praying for and about so much of late, as though most of us lacked it; is it something we really need? I don't find the word in my Bible." The reply was that the dictionary definition is "Skill, nice discernment, expertness." "Well," said the old lady, "Bible words are good enough for me; when I've got all my Bible tells me to pray for I shall not need to go to any dictionary for a word to express my lack. Somehow the word don't seem to ring quite true," she added thoughtfully; "I guess its not worth all the notice it is getting lately." We wonder if it is.

AN all-day conference of workers of the New York state W. C. T. U. was held ten days ago in Broadway Tabernacle, New York city, Mrs. Mary T. Burt, state president, in charge. New Jersey sent representative and prominent National workers, including the National president were in attendance. The topics discussed were: What is Temperance Education? Temperance Work among Soldiers and Sailors, Social Drinking and Constitutional Prohibition. Miss Colman, Mrs. Hammer, Mrs. McClees, Mrs. Bottome and Miss Greenwood were the leaders in these discussions, while Rev. Geo. E. Reed, and Mr. A. M. Powell gave excellent addresses. Mrs. Hannah Whitall Smith closed the afternoon session with one of her instructive Bible readings and the evening session was occupied by Miss Willard and Gen. Clinton B. Fiske. These conferences are gatherings of power. All state unions would gain materially by adopting the plan so successfully inaugurated by the New York W. C. T. U.

THE Normal Institute of Hygiene and Heredity held this week under W. C. T. U. auspices at the national capital is most fortunate in being co-etaneous with the meeting of the American Medical Association in the same city, whereby it becomes possible to secure the co-operation of some of the most eminent men and women of the medical profession. These are on the program: Addresses by Elliot Coues, M. D., Prof. of Anatomy, Medical Department, Columbian University; Albert L. Gihon, M. D., Medical Director U. S. Navy, and President American Public Health Association; Joseph Taber Johnson, M. D., Prof. of Obstetrics, Medical Department, Columbian University; J. H. Kellogg, M. D., Member of Michigan State Board of Health, and others, besides a very novel and attractive discussion on the heredity question, by Miss Mary Whitall Smith at a young ladies' meeting connected with the Institute. The Washington W. C. T. U. is among the bravest and broadest in its undertakings.

T[illegible] been slow to [illegible]'s praise- [illegible] every But [illegible]raise [illegible] that [illegible] compulsory [illegible] government built on a broad educational foundation, denied the request though far more conservative states had granted it.

The W. C. T. U. asked for a reformatory prison for women criminals, but though renowned for humane tendencies, this great state refused the petition while making large and even unneccessary appropriation in other directions. The W. C. T. U. and other organizations of women asked that women be placed on the state boards of education, charity and philanthropy whose institutions are filled almost equally with inmates of both sexes. This was also denied.

The W. C. T. U. and large numbers of men and women outside this organization pressed the submission of an amendment to the state constitution striking the word "male" out of the constitution, and though it was passed by the preceding legislature, this "reform" assembly of a state committed to reforms, denied the women of the state, whom everybody credits with the successful accomplishments of prohibition, any further participation in a government that claims to be a government by the whole people.

Brothers of Iowa, how is your gold become dim by these failures! "The precious sons of Zion, comparable to fine gold, how are they esteemed earthen pitchers, the work of the hands of the potter." The lamentations of this Jeremiah are ended.

LAST week we had the pleasure of welcoming to our city Mr. T. H. Barker, secretary of the United Kingdom Temperance Alliance, and Mr. William Hoyle, the eminent statistician of England, whom we are proud to number among our contributors.

These gentlemen returning from Colorado, after a visit to nearly all the prominent cities of the east and middle west, say they have seen far less drunkenness in America than they expected, far less also than in England. They are greatly encouraged by the success of our prohibitory laws in Kansas, and by the healthy prohibition sentiment that pervades the country. THE UNION SIGNAL tendered them a little reception at the Leland Hotel, where "mine host" one of the celebrated family of hosts, spared no pains to make a temperance dinner as attractive as those of the tippling bon vivants.

Speeches of welcome were made by Mrs. T. B. Carse, and the editor of the paper, for the W. C. T. U. and its organ THE UNION SIGNAL; by Judge C. C. Bonney, president of the National Law and Order League, for that society, and by the Rev. Dr. Jutkins, for the prohibition party. The responses by the English guests were full of information and of cheer, full too of the sweet spirit of united service for God and country, though the countries be separated by leagues of distance.

Rev. Simeon Gilbert, D.D., western editor of the Congregationalist, then gave our English cousins a brief but eloquent statement concerning The Attitude of the American church toward The Temperance reform; Mr. R. D. Fowler, of the Anglo American Packing company, spoke of The Englishman in America, and the Rev. Robert West, editor of the Advance, made a ringing address on the Religious Press and Temperance.

The National W. C. T. U. officers sent telegrams and letters of regret, as did several representatives of the daily press, and greatly to our regret, the Rev. Herrick Johnson, D.D., who was kept at home by illness.

Taken altogether the affair was notable and enjoyable in the extreme.

THE FOUNTAIN OF LIFE.

BY MARION HUNTING.

Jesus by the well-side sitting,
Weary, thirsty, sad and lone,
To the wondering, erring stranger,
Said in gentle, tender tone,
Whoso drinketh of this water,
He will thrist, and thirst again,
But the Water of Salvation
Will the weary soul sustain.

Thirsty ones, come to this Fountain,
Christ, your Savior, still is nigh,
And this clear and "Living Water"
Can your deepest needs supply.
Turn away from poisoned fountains
That bring sorrow, woe, and pain;
These sweet waters, pure and healing,
Will give health and joy again.

We still hear thy voice, dear Savior!
Oh! our thirsty souls supply,
With those cooling drops, so precious
From that Fountain never dry.
We have drank from earthly cisterns,
And perhaps the poisoned bowl,
Now we seek the "Living Waters,"
For the weary, fainting soul.

That pure Fountain will not fail us,
Whereso'er our footsteps stray,
Whether in the crowded city,
Or along a lonely way,
For the streams of "Love Eternal"
Wash away all sin and strife,
And bear up our joyful spirits
Into "Everlasting Life."

IS THE "BAND OF HOPE" A SUCCESS?

BY L. J. FITHIAN.

For the benefit of such organizations as may feel dissatisfied with the annual report of work accomplished in the temperance cause, allow a few statements regarding the W. C. T. U. formed here September 18, 1881 by Miss Willard. Under the charm of her rare eloquence, inaugural members numbered fifty, but the roll-call was never responded to by so encouraging a representation at any subsequent meeting. The attendance kept fair, however, several months, then, without apparent reason, save that excuseless one of indifference, gradually lessened; and the second year was entered upon by a "faithful few" with a feeling of disheartenment. Absentees when labored with asked, "What do your meetings amount to? What do you do at them, or as a society, to advance the cause you advocate?" Distributing temperance literature, union meetings, lectures, prayers, these several means to that one end, were commonly deemed ineffectual.

The idea of establishing a Band of Hope, that should speak for itself, and the society that formed and fostered it, as well as inculcate a broader, deeper tone of temperance sentiment, was proposed, but the project appeared much of an undertaking, considering the poverty of the treasury, and the few active laborers procurable to carry out and on such an enterprise. The belief that concentration of thought and work in one direction, with appropriation of the feeble financial resources to the same object, would prove more satisfactory, and better evidence the will to work as well as pray, stimulated to the venture made. Dearth of funds necessitated the humblest start by way of furnishing instructive matter, temperance publishing houses so extensively and attractively issue. Hymnal cards, and Miss Colman's catechisms comprised first purchase, and later, "Ripples of Song" formed a welcome addition. Yet, even under these circumstances, the question, "Is the 'Band of Hope' a success?" receives affirmative response, endorsed by experience and popular verdict.

Organized November 19, 1882, in the Presbyterian chapel, with attendance of ninety, the scholarship, unlike membership of the W. C. T. U., has since steadily increased, having reached a few Sundays since, one hundred and fifty-four. The interest and enthusiasm evinced by the children has indeed been remarkable. The general conjecture that this manifestation was due to curiosity, or love of novelty, and would wane as the school aged, has, perforce, resolved into wonder at its unabated continuance.

The Band has been for many months self-supporting, although the collections have been made up entirely of voluntary contributions. Incidents surprisingly numerous illustrate that the principles here taught are carried into practice, that seed here sown falls into goodly ground early to yield fruitage.

A few brought to my special notice will serve to substantiate the answer given to the subject query: A Band of Hope boy, some twelve years of age, was urged by a boy-friend to drive into the country with him on an errand. After leaving the village, the inviter, with an important air remarked he intended they should have a jolly old time of it, and drew from under the seat a suspicious looking bottle with a significance unmistakable. To his astonishment, his companion looked with decided disapproval at the prospective "treat," and at once began to tell what he had learned about the poisonous nature of such things, the dreadful danger and harm in the use of any form of alcohol. He plead with him to throw away the bottle, and never again have anything to do with that kind of peril. After considerable hesitation, and earnest argument, like a novel, the ending is satisfactory. The bottle was hurled out and broken into fragments, its colored contents mingling with the roadside dust, and the boy, through the influence of that day's companion, became a manly member of the "Band of Hope."

Again, a heroic little fellow fell out of a second story window, and fractured a bone besides otherwise badly hurting himself. The doctor, before attempting to set his limb, ordered brandy for him. To his surprise, the boy stoutly objected. Confident he could overrule such a small boy's whim, he argued his point, but without avail. The mother next tried her powers of persuasion, telling him his taking it in this case would in no degree violate his Band of Hope pledge, it being allowed as a medicine. Still he resisted, saying, he did not need it, and he preferred to do without it, which he did.

In these days of women's advancement, it would be irrelevant to example heroes alone, when heroines likewise abound. An eight-year old girl signed the pledge of her own accord one Sunday, and the following Monday a barrel of cider arrived at her home. She was very fond of this drink, and had been accustomed to have all she wished, her mother believing it good for her naturally delicate health. Accordingly when it came, she said to her, "Now you will be happy, you will have what you like so much," but she answered, "I can't take it any more, I've signed the pledge."

"When and why did you do that?" demanded the mother, surprised and displeased.

"Yesterday, because I wanted to," was the reply, whereupon an elder sister present exclaimed, "You little fool! to sign against cider this time o' year when you knew we expected some soon." Next day, when at her auntie's, she braved her next temptation. Here a goblet of clear aromatic cider was brought in to her as a pleasant surprise, accompanied by the words, "I have something for you, you will be glad to take."

The child repeated to her what she had said at home; and her aunt, though annoyed by this imposed deprivation of a "harmless pleasure," very sensibly said: "Of course if you signed against it you must not break your word; I did not know of your pledge when I offered this to you." She spoke with some indignation about it afterward, supposing the little niece had been urged to take this step by fanatic temperance instructors, without an appreciation of what it involved. That so young a child could consider and resolve of herself seemed to her incredible. Upon personal inquiry, the act was shown to have been unexpected on the part of the teacher, who averred that this little pupil exercised her own free volition in the matter; and the result proved the pledge to have been understandingly taken.

That day, at dinner, a pitcher of the tempting beverage was passed and commented upon, her sisters, seated on either side of her, drinking with enthusiastic relish. She was entreated to try some; it was sweet and free from alcohol, so could do her no harm; nor would she break her word, for alcohol was what she promised not to touch. Many an older head would have succumbed to such reasoning, without weighing the letter of the law. Did she? With tears streaming from her wistful eyes, she shook her head, crying, "I can't touch it;" and she remained firm throughout the season.

A similar case dissimilar—to speak paradoxically—forms another instance. An older girl than the one above cited, when she first came to the Band of Hope, signed the pledge; and sometime later entered my class. One Sunday she requested a private interview with me after school, and I noticed she looked very sober. When alone she said she had been very anxious to see and talk with me; (she meant to call Saturday, but could not). It appeared Wednesday their milkman handed her a jug of cider as a present, telling her it was just made and she must drink all she could. The jug was minus a cork, so she carried it, to use her expression smelling it all the way. It failed to afford her the usual pleasure, and, as I gathered from her account, she set it down before her mother with a sigh, while the following dialogue ensued:

"Oh dear, I dare not touch it, dare I, mamma?"

"Why, I don't know. If it is perfectly sweet there is no alcohol in it, and it is quite harmless."

"But I signed the pledge you know; would you think I dare take any after that?"

"I can see no reason why one need be deprived of really sweet cider—certainly that is innocent."

"And are you going to drink some? You go to the Band of Hope."

"Yes, I shall take it so long as it keeps sweet."

"I took one glass then," she said, "but I did not enjoy it much, and did not touch any more; I have felt worried about it ever since, and was so anxious to ask you if I did wrong."

My situation was embarrassing on account of the mother's part in the transaction. But, taking the pledge as the child did, impulsively, without preparatory study, gave excuse for the presumption that she did not then properly comprehend its nature or its sanctity; so this point was made to form the basis of discussion demanded by her question. Suffice it to say, she manifested such sincere sorrow for having yielded, and such resolute promise to be faithful in future, I was greatly touched; and when she sweetly thanked me for my advice, I felt the force of the unorthodox sentiment Shakespeare breathed when he declared:

"There is some soul of goodness in things evil,
Would men observingly distil it out."

This, my last recital, has boys and girls both for its dramatis personae.

Scene: A family, consisting of parents, four children and a cousin-guest, seated at a dining table at a neighboring lake The host moved the opening of certain choice wine on this occasion, and the gentleman cousin readily seconding the motion, it was carried, i. e., the wine, in this case without the formality of putting the question to vote. The four Band of Hopites looked the horror they dare not voice, and the mother felt a painful sympathy for their evident distress; at the same time realizing the father's disposition to be master in his own house, deemed interference unwise. The wine-glass was of the standard liliputian order, and the one did not satisfy, so the glasses were re-filled, when, simultaneously, the silent watchers burst out crying and left the table, and in an adjoining room sobbed as if their little hearts would break. Their mother followed, hoping to soothe and quiet them; but they greeted her with the tragic appeal, "Oh, mamma, mamma! stop it; dear papa will die a drunkard!"

Imagine the effect of this serio-comic event. The mother, who related the circumstance to me, assured me that although her husband was principled against being governed by his children, he was certainly influenced, and since then careful not to indulge in their presence.

Cases of this nature multiply, furnishing practical proof that teachings in this school blossom into preachings out of its confines; and temperance sermons unconsciously directed in words or deeds by these little ones, accomplish what nothing else, save change of heart, can. Then the strong sentiment imbibed by the children themselves! Their aversion for the three vices they are importuned to fight, growing with their growth, must more or less mould their childhood; and as a consequence influence their maturer years, when, as men and women, as a nation's people, they shall become powers for good or evil. True, these lessons may be forgotten or ignored by some, but such must prove the exception rather than the rule.

Here too the teachers are learn*ing* rather than learn*ed* instructors; and in proportion to the study devoted to impart knowledge do they themselves receive education in this branch of science—and as intelligence broadens so resultant influences widen in behalf of the cause.

In view of these premises is it not logical in conclusion to inquire, Who can compute the possibilities of good to be accomplished, of success to be attained, by a Band of Hope organization?

THE BRANDY KING'S REFORM.

AN INTERVIEW WITH LARS OLSEN SMITH, BY THE PALL MALL GAZETTE.

Mr. Smith loquitur:

"The condition of the people depends more than anything else upon their food. You have done a great deal here in this country for the lodgings of the poor. I have been today over the Noel estate and the Peabody buildings, and your building societies are also very good; but take mankind as a whole, and you will find that of the expenditure of a workingman 15 per cent. only goes in house rent, while 60 per cent. goes in food. Therefore, if you provide every workingman with a free house forever, the effect is only equal to saving him 15 per cent. of his wages. But if you can make a radical reformation in his food, you have a much greater margin to play upon. If you could provide him with food twice as nourishing as that which he gets now, so that he only needs to buy half as much of it, or if you give him as much food as he gets at present at half the price, you save him at one stroke 30 per cent. of his wages, or twice as much as the whole of his house rent. And it can be done. For the proof of that, I have done it; and there is no reason why what I have done should not be done in every town and village in the whole world. Believe me, that is the source whence a great increase is to be made to the wealth of our laboring poor. That is where the waste is—a waste which is not only felt in actual expenditure of money on food, but in insufficient nourishment, causing physical degeneracy and a craving for stimulants, which lies at the root of much of the drunkenness of the present day. I begin my reform of of society from the bottom—from the food which man eats. The idea came to me some years ago, when I was lying ill. I came upon Sir Henry Thompson's book, 'Food and Feeding,' which is now in its fourth edition, and there I found set forth certain truths concerning the waste of nutritive substance in our system of cooking, and much useful information as to the respective quantities of the constituents needed by the human frame to keep it in efficient working order. I thought over this book a good deal, and I made investigations among all the eminent scientific authorities on the continent, who confirmed the accuracy of Sir H. Thompson's remarks. Then the light dawned upon me that it was in this direction that I might make a great change for the better in the condition of the people. But before doing anything I investigated the matter thoroughly. There is hardly a popular institution providing cheap food for the people in the whole of Europe that I have not personally visited and investigated for myself how it works. I have also sat down at the table of almost every public kitchen on the continent and also in America.

"I have examined almost every system of cooking that is known to civilized man, and I have now come to the conclusion that no system is so good as that of cooking by steam water bath, so economical, so efficient. In cooking the great thing is temperature; and by this means it is possible either to roast or to boil each description of food at the exact degree of the thermometer that is necessary. The system at present in use in the barracks of the German army is by far the best. I have bought up the patent for Norway and Sweden, and before long I expect to have the machines in working order in every town in the whole country. You may think this is a simple matter, but let me tell you the results. In Sweden the workingman, at the ordinary cook shops, will pay one shilling two pence a day for three meals for himself. At my kitchen I supply him with three meals a day for 8 pence, making a saving of 40 per cent., and for this 8 pence I supply much better food—the very best that can be bought anywhere, and much better cooked than you can get in any hotels in London. I can do this and make a profit at it—a profit of 2½ pence on each day. I charge them more than cost price in order that the profits may accumulate for establishing other kitchens in other places, and for furnishing the kitchens with adjuncts in the shape of music-halls, libraries, etc., while a part of the accumulated profit is devoted to providing pensions for members in old age. You do not believe me?

"Well, come to Stockholm and I will show you my kitchen in working order. Every Saturday night those who wish to avail themselves of the kitchen must pay an advance for the whole seven days. They receive twenty-one tickets, one for each meal. They can give them away if they please, but they are never wasted. We know, therefore, exactly to one meal how many will be required through the week. At Berlin where there is a society of charitable ladies who supply cheap food for the people, they supply it to any one who comes, and as a consequence they never know whether their demand will be great or small, and they have to eat up one day what is left over from another. Under my system nothing is left over. We know exactly what is wanted, and it is cooked fresh when it is wanted. The people can either come and eat their meal at the kitchen or they can bring it home in vessels which keep it warm. I send out meals to factories and workshops in vessels so constructed that they keep warm for hours. There is nothing wasted, and the food is apportioned according to the season of the year, on the most scientific principles. Care is taken to provide exactly the number of grams of fatty matter and albumen—in winter more fat, in spring more albumen; but the correct proportion is always maintained. We have all varieties of food, each cooked in its own proper way to perfection. In the course of the year we have as many as sixty from menus which people can take their choice. The economy resulting is surprising. The waste of separate fires and separate kitchen rooms is appalling. I undertake to provide any family of man, wife, and two children, who will pay me the rent of their kitchen and the cost of their fuel, with dinner all the year round for nothing!"

"It is time that the poor man had his turn; and he can have it far more than most people think by a little organization and a determination to prevent waste. They can be better fed for less money; and not only better fed but better lodged and better clothed. It is a great work, I tell you, that we are engaged in in Sweden; and it has many sides, of which the public kitchen is only one, although the most important one. We have formed a workmen's union which has already enrolled many thousands of members, and which before long will extend through the whole of Sweden. For the members of this union we will establish what you would call co-operative stores, where all the articles they require can be had at nearly cost price, with only so much added as is necessary to pay working expenses and leave a profit for other purposes. By this means we shall secure to all the Swedish working classes an opportunity of getting necessary articles of the best quality at the lowest price." "But, Mr. Smith," interrupted our representative, "will this not set against you all the shop keepers in Sweden?" "No," said Mr. Smith, "for we have provided against that. The shop keepers themselves are much troubled by the difficulty of buying goods cheaply from the wholesale houses. There are four thousand shop keepers in Sweden, and we give these an opportunity of working together with us if they will consent to our terms. The workman's bank will supply them with goods at cost price, plus one-half per cent. commission, on condition that they supply all members of our union with goods of the same quality as we supply to them at store prices. To non-members they may charge what they like and adulterate as they please; but our members must have first rate quality at a low price, and the shop keepers will benefit thereby." "But, Mr. Smith," again objected his interlocutor, "by this means you will destroy the wholesale firms." "That is true," replied Mr. Smith, "but that doesn't much. They are all rich people, and they can turn their capital to some other industry. We are establishing a great wholesale agency in Stockholm which will buy all the goods we require, in Sweden, in London, in Hamburg—in fact, wherever they are to be had; and by this means we will be able to supply ourselves at a minimum cost for distribution. Everything is done for cash. There will be no bad debts, and it will not need much capital to set it going. What capital is required is not lacking, however. There is no charge made to members; everyone is free to join our union, and we hope to have in time the whole laboring population of Sweden enrolled.

"Another great scheme of ours is the providing of good houses for the poor. We have set on foot something like your building societies, in which the funds of the savings-banks, etc., will be available for the purpose of advances to those who wish to become owners of their own houses, and the scale of payments is so calculated that in twelve years, with interest upon interest, the whole of the house is paid for. If, therefore, this scheme is properly carried out, in twelve years the whole of the Swedish workingmen will be living in their own houses. A fourth method upon which we rely for improving the condition of our people is the establishment of popular banks, like the popular bank in northern Italy, the work of which I have examined, and which has been a very great success. The money of the popular bank will be available for the establishment of co-operative stores, public kitchens, and all other institutions for the benefit of the people. I will not have one gentleman connected with the whole concern. In my bank at Stockholm the directors are workingmen, and all the clerks are daughters of workingmen, for we employ women as much as possible. Sweden has only a very small population, 4,500,000 altogether; but, with these 4,500,000 we may work out some social experiments that will surprise much greater nations, and lead to their general adoption. One great point that we never lose sight of is that you must give a man a stake in the country if you want to make him a good citizen. If the man feels that he will get only so much for his work, whether it be much or little, he will always be trying to diminish the quantity of that work, whereas if he feels that he has a future, and that all the money is being saved for him so that in his old age he will have funds upon which to fall back—when he feels that by increasing his work he can increase his earnings, then you will find that he will be more prudent, more industrious, and he will work harder and longer, and you will have what as yet you have nowhere in the world, a contented and prosperous laboring population. All these things—the public kitchen, the co-operative store, wholesale and retail, the building societies, the popular bank, the pension for old workmen—are parts of a great scheme of social reorganization which I have thought out in detail, and is now being carried out in Stockholm and other places in Sweden. The workingmen—and nearly everybody is a workingman in Sweden or a working farmer—are enthusiastic on behalf of a change which promises to secure them such a future as they have never before enjoyed. There is no politics in the movement. It is purely social. But on one side it touches the legislature, and that is the reform of the licensing laws, which this year we hope to see sanctioned by parliament. That is a great question, which must be dealt with radically if any good is to be done."

SHORT TEMPERANCE TALKS.

BY MISS C. S. BURNETT.

No. 7—Facts and Figures.

England was surprised when she learned the that the United States spends annually $95,240,000 for public schools. But along with these figures that speak so loudly for the intelligence of our people, was borne, as if in mockery, these other words—the United States spend annually $715,576,000 for liquor. Yes, for every dollar we pay to our schools that our children may be trained in ways of wisdom and virtue, we pay seven to the saloons and grog shops to drag them down to vice. Again, twenty times as much is spent for drink as is spent for all church purposes. What will be the result? Evidently it must be a degeneracy in morals. Can we, as a nation, afford to sit idly down and allow this state of things to continue?

Guizot says: "A republic only rests on intelligence and morality." If this nation shall enter upon the next hundred years under as favorable auspices as it began the present one, our schools and churches must keep pace with the population, while these insidious foes that lurk in every byway seducing our youth from paths of rectitude must be overthrown.

The war that is already begun must continue till the enemy shall unconditionally surrender. If this barter and sale in liquor were a private affair, if we had only to deal with individuals, our task would be comparatively easy; but the traffic has thrown around it the strong arm of the law.

We sometimes exclaim: What can we do? How can we convince men that it is wrong to drink that which our government says it is right to sell? Yes, the license system lies at the root of all this evil. How can we hope to succeed while this system legalizes and justifies the infernal traffic in rum? "We must lay the ax at the root of the tree; it is folly to trifle longer with the branches." Our government receives $70,000,000 a year from this traffic. As 70,000 fall annually into drunkards' graves the government only receives $1,000 for each victim. Can the hand of the nation be clean while it accepts this blood tax of license? The young in our schools and streets cry out to us, "Lead us not into temptation." Until the masses are so educated that the saloons are not tolerated the young are not safe.

"As we strive to raise the fallen
May we not do something more;
In removing the temptation
And the tempter from the door?"

Can this be done? Why not? China has been a total abstinence nation for more than a thousand years, and drunkenness is unknown in Mohammedan lands save when introduced by "Christians." If Islamism and Buddhism has succeeded in keeping the monster evil from whole nations ought not Christian lands to blush at the thought they have not or cannot do so much? The reason we have not done this is, we have never tried. We have only been trying to "regulate the evil," as if sin could be regulated. We are now learning that the right to control carries along with it the right to prohibit if the well being of society demands it. That prohibition is the one pressing demand of the hour no one will deny. Let us work, and hope, and pray till our efforts shall culminate in universal triumph.

THE WORK SHOP, NO. 6.

"W. C. T. U. Exchange"—An Ohio Idea—Relief Work in Iowa.

"New occasions teach new duties." Impressions are borne in upon our minds out of the "vasty deep" of thought, and we do well to give them due hospitality. Let us be introduced and get acquainted; later on we can decide whether to adopt or disavow them. Here is the latest impression coming from the bright mind of Mrs. J. T. Foote of Cleveland. She broached it first in Mary Woodbridge's Amendment Herald whereupon the Work Shop sent her a letter of inquiry, and in response received the following:

During all these years since the crusade, it has been quite the fashion to imagine that the only way to help the temperance cause was to make oneself conspicuous, to write, talk, walk the streets with a petition, collect money, edit a paper or visit saloons. This thought grew out of the crusade. We have tried to counteract it in many ways in these latter times, but it remains for the "W. C. T. U. Exchange" to prove that for every "Maid of Orleans," on her white charger, one thousand quiet figures working at home with needles, are needed as a background.

To begin this work on a small scale, I have thought to start out with the young girls in my own immediate vicinity, and organize a "Second Amendment society" to exist until constitutional prohibition is secured in my own state. I think I could hold the interest first with a "crazy quilt," to be sold to get money for campaign purposes. I think I can get older people among that class of women who have been benefited by our reform work to add their mite, perhaps in the shape of helping to make a rag carpet. I've hardly thought it out yet, but my plan is to get hold of outsiders, those who have done little or nothing for the work. I should dep ecate a work that adds cares only to members of W. C. T. Unions who are already overburdened. But there is a large sisterhood who sympathize, and who are constantly saying, "I wish I could help, but I cannot do anything." How glad I would be to say to them, why yes, you can make an undergarment for a little school miss, and send to the W. C. T. U. Exchange; the gift will be credited to you for tempearance work, and sold to some mother who has more money than time, and who wants to help the cause.

I believe that in large cities, a constant demand could be found for undergarments, tidy gingham dresses, aprons, waists, etc., for misses from six to twelve years of age. I think many women in country places who are so active in local benevolences would gladly make in simple tasteful fashion such garments, and many a merchant would give the material. My ideas have been growing upon me for some years.

I have watched the Catholic sisters as they have entered the grocery across the way, and come out with a bar of soap perhaps or a pound of tea. They refuse nothing which can be converted into money or food. They will help build a school or a nunnery it seems to me on purpose to consume the fragments of a community. Oh the wealth of little things: Isn't that what the Lord meant when he said, He would take of the little things of this world to confound the things that were great?

I talked with the women in charge of the exchange in our own city. Things have been very dull. Ladies do not buy nice embroideries and paintings; they prefer to do such work themselves. "But," she says, "there is constant sale for kitchen aprons." Well, let us make kitchen aprons them! Silver cups as souvenirs more dear to the giver than they possibly can be to anybody else may have their place to relieve the homeliness of the picture, and where the giver occupies a place in the hearts of the people, such gifts will add money to the treasury. But for the most part we shall probable have to depend on aprons and "such like." I think the department when in complete working order will take about this form: Local unions will gather up in their own towns, say once or twice a year every thing that people would give, these articles to be taken to local rooms carefully classified, (something probably like the hodge podge coming into Queen Esther's hands, hard to assign to any class); all perishable things sold right then and there for what they will bring.

Any nice things sent direct to county unions where another classifying process shall take place, and then what can't be sold then pass on to state headquarters and through that again to National.

It don't seem to me much dross would remain by that time. Many useless things would probably be donated at first but this would adjust itself at last. We are wise women, and we'd bring our common sense to bear on this department as on every other. We'd study it up and master it, and I believe truly that it would prove the golden key that would unlock the treasure house.

In The Union Signal of the 27th, I read in the address of Mrs. Merrick of New Orleans, the speech of the "intelligent gentleman" to her "You'll never accomplish your purpose while we hold the purse strings." Let us get our own purse strings drawn over a plethoric purse and see our purpose accomplished! I wish I could tell you how my faith in the success of this plan has has grown.

My experience in church work has taught me that women really have no money they can control; that, as a rule, they are prodigal of things they do control. Ask a woman for twenty-five cents and she refuses. Ask her for a cake and she will give you two. While collecting for our "Interdenominational tea," I asked a lady to help either by giving twenty-five cents or by baking a cake. She said she had no money but would send a cake. When the basket came it contained not only the cake but 10 lbs. of choice meat. She had tucked her gift into the monthly butcher's and grocer's bill, and no body growled. That's a horrible state of affairs for a married woman to confess to an unmarried one isn't it? But it takes an uncommonly good man to be just entirely pleased to have his wife do her own little giving without his supervision.

I know a lady who actually felt that she couldn't give twenty-five cents to help on a church fair but who bought dainty cashmere yarn and knit three pair of fancy mittens which she donated, and that sold readily for seventy-five cents per pair. Her husband looked on complacently because he was proud of his wife's handiwork, and the price of the yarn melted into an unseen fraction, in the general store bill.

I'll not attempt to classify these eccentricities of man's general make up, but accepting the condition of things why not "build our house thereon." Then there is hidden in the hearts of the poverty stricken women who have been helped by this movement a devotion that we have never utilized, but which is at our command if we can devise a way to use it. Will not the "Exchange" open a door for them to "show their faith by works?"

Several years ago I sustained a weekly cottage prayer meeting. This was held in different homes and plain teas furnished by the woman in whose home we met. Of course many attended who could not entertain in their own homes and a good deal of ingenuity was excercised to prevent any painful contrasts. One day we were invited by one of the poorest and most desolate women we ever had with us and I took the opportunity of suggesting a plan that I had been contemplating for some time; that as the days were shortening and many had to get supper after their return home, the tea should be omitted. This woman in a pitiful voice said: 'Don't pass that over until you've been to my house. I want to do this for you.' I think I shall never forget that prayer meeting or that tea. It was pathetic enough for a romance—the climb up the narrow stairs, still wet from the scrubbing they'd had, leading into a 'coal shed' thence into a bed room turned into a kitchen by putting in a deal table and cracked cooking stove, then into the bedroom proper, which was that afternoon a chapel, dining room and all, and over all the glow on that woman's face. She was doing something for temperance. It was the Lord's table in very deed and truth. Now the devotion of just such women as that, will fill our treasury, if we can but use our ingenuity in turning their gifts and graces to account."

"As soon as possible I mean to work out these ideas in my own community and through The Union Signal I will report. That's the way after all, that all our departments have grown; first somewhere a woman with an inspiration; then a local work that is so wise and womanly, and so evidently "belongs" that it is reported in county convention, is endorsed by executive committee, spreads, and grows until by and by the dear "national" puts its arm about us and there we are snug and cozy, one of the "lively stones" that makes up this wonderful house. It is a fairy story and I'm so glad I am in it."

Now the W. C. T. U., local, state, and national, is a Roman mosaic into which can be fitted every creature's bests. Time can not spoil nor custom stale its infinite variety. It is a flowing stream, not a stagnant pool. You never know when you've come to the end. Like a gifted mind it is full of surprises and constantly brings forth from its rich treasure house things new and old. The secret is that our W. C. T. U. is made up of myriad minds and hence is like Shakespeare—myriad-minded itself! Nay, more and better than all, these women pray for divine light on brain as well as heart. Hardly a day passes without letters in which occur such sentences as these: "I have been ill and out of the work this winter," or "We have had sickness in the family and I have been up at night a great deal," or "It has seemed my duty not to go out to meetings for a while," but in each case the letters ended with words like these, "I prayed that now, when I am called aside from the beloved work my brain might be lightened up with thoughts and plans that would be just what our union needs."

I confess I can not carelessly put aside such revelations nor can I think it would be right to do so. Whatever helps to utilize the forces of that great army of good women who, because they neither speak or write think themselves of secondary value in our work, it is my joy to know. And I say deliberately that no plan yet proposed seems to me to give greater promise of calling into play all the blessed "diversities of gifts" among our great sisterhood, than the one herein proposed. As our Cleveland sister wisely proposes, let it first be tried on a small scale and "developed" as a photographic artist "brings out" a negative. If the outline is clear and sharp and the colors prove steadfast, we shall all want to order copies after we have "seen the proof."

—Quite in harmony with the foregoing is a recent letter from a dear old lady of sixty-two who lives in Fort Dodge, Iowa, Mrs. S. Tod by name, who says she is proud to be "even a leaf on a small twig of the great W. C. T. U. tree" and that "not having seen any report of this kind of work she wants to reach the Rock of Ages women with what has been a very successful plan in her own local union." She says:

"Our relief department of W. C. T. U. has done a good work. We occupy as our headquarters two large rooms over the postoffice where we hold our meetings of all kinds, Bible readings, mothers' meetings, temperance school. In one of these rooms we have a large box which, covered and cushioned, serves for a seat for six persons. In this box we keep all kinds of cast-off clothing, these articles being solicited through the papers and personally. When in our gospel work or in any way we find a destitute family, we go to our box and you would be surprised to know how often we find just what is needed. We have divided this department into three branches: Gift, sale, and exchange. The department is conducted by a committee of one lady from each church. These ladies inquire into cases reported and also oversee distribution of goods. They put a price on everything brought to the rooms, never the value, but only a small sum, because we found that many and often the most worthy would buy when not willing to take them as charity. We keep a book account of all transactions and no one can have over three dollars' worth within three months unless in very special cases of need. The mites we take in from these sales we keep as a fund to provide dainties for the sick, and to get anything needed that cannot be supplied from our box.

"In our exchange branch we take articles that poor women bring, such as tidies or patchwork, they setting their price and we giving them value for value. Much good can be done and souls can be reached by supplying the needs of the body." FRANCES E. WILLARD.

THE W. C T. U. AT THE COUNTY FAIR AND THE STATE EXPOSITION.

DEAR UNION SIGNAL:—The season for the practical work of this department is very near. All that we have done so far is but preparatory to the real work before us. So many inquiries have come to me in regard to the work at fairs and expositions that I have concluded to ask you to give space for some instructions in addition to those contained in the circulars already sent out. These are simply the outcome of the many valuable suggestions that have come to me from those actively engaged in this line of work. One of the best things to do is to get as many women as have control of any money to take fair stock. It is cheap and always for sale. Holding stock gives a woman a voice in the management of a fair if she chooses. Try and induce women from the country, who are interested in the W. C. T. U., to take stock and get themselves on the premium list committee. Then get the W. C. T. U. to offer a premium for an essay on "Alcohol and its Effects on the Human System," and have it upon the regular list, and you have attention drawn to scientific temperance. In those states where a bill for "Scientific Temperance Instruction" is to be brought before the people it would be a great point to have such premiums offered at the state fair, and at every county fair.

By all means have speakers to lecture on the subject on the evenings during the fair season in the towns where the county fairs are held. Such towns are always full of visitors eager for any entertainment that presents itself. The audiences will be larger than any that could be gathered in any other way. They are composed of the very elements that need to be reached. Very likely no house will be convenient that will hold the crowd. As it is generally pleasant weather have an outdoor meeting with plenty of music. Do not let these grand opportunities for instructing the people pass by without profiting by them for they come but once a year; and then, in the very time when the hardest work for any such bill will have to be done.

Nor must we let the fourth of July pass without making special use of it. In Iowa it will be a day of jubilee all over the state. Why cannot the W. C. T. U. make it the occasion for the descent of an avalanche of temperance all over the country? If you are unable to get a place on the program of your local celebration get up a celebration yourselves; and make it so attractive that the crowd will follow you. Fire off a big gun in the way of a rousing temperance speech; and keep up a perfect fusilade of small arms in the way of temperance leaflets. Have the Bands of Hope and Temperance Cadets parade with banners flying. Be you sure where the women and children and good dinners are the men will be.

We must also make a special point of political meetings. We are constantly reminded that this is campaign year, and not the time for temperance work. Let us prove this to be a mistake by utilizing the campaign itself to do temperance work as we did before. Be present at every campaign rally. If possible, levy on them by furnishing a lunch for those without it, and see that every voter carries something home with him to read and study after the excitement of the day has passed and he has forgotten the bosh and sophistry he heard under the guise of a political speech. In those cities where expositions and state fairs are held I hope every such occasion will be used to the utmost.

The W. C. T. Unions of Cincinnati are planning for a grand display at their next great exposition. They propose to make it a state work, and solicit contributions of beautiful articles from the state in general for sale, and distribute an amount of literature proportionate to the immense crowds that throng there during the month it is held. Will not other cities who have the same opportunity try and do a similar work?

We should have a National representation at the World's Exposition at New Orleans. The New Orleans W. C. T. U. will have a lunch room, but if we could secure space for it, there ought to be a bazaar, or some other handsome display worthy of the National work.

I have written to Mrs. Merrick, the state president, in regard to space for such display, and I am confident that if we can secure space there will be no difficulty in having plenty of beautiful articles for exhibition; as already many offers have been made of such things. Even if we cannot acccmplish this there should be contributions made all over the country of money to get literature for distribution there.

In this way people will be reached that could not be in any other way.

I hope every W. C. T. U. that is able to have a booth at a fair will remember this National work at the World's Exposition, and donate part of its profits thereto. No one state or section of country can do it. It is a work for all, and every W. C. T. U. is responsible for its success. I still believe that this department ought to be made a source of revenue for National temperance work in general; and ask every woman in the W. C. T. U. to avail herself of any opportunity she may have to turn produce into money, to do so, and send the proceeds to me or to Miss Pugh, the National treasurer.

I will soon send out the report blanks, and I hope that the local reports will be in early and that they will be full, so that the world may know the grand work the W. C. T. U. is doing in this special line of effort.

Yours sincerely, JOSEPHINE R. NICHOLS,
Supt. Dept. State and County Fairs N. W. C. T. U.

"MICHIGAN MY MICHIGAN."

DEAR UNION SIGNAL:—Temperance is in politics in this state, and the reform we advocate gave heat and interest to a large percentage of the spring municipal elections.

In Owasso the battle was squarely drawn. The temperance people nominated, the first ticket for city officers, with D. M. Estey for mayor. They then in the interest of law and order, asked the republicans to take their man, himself a republican, but when the caucus came he was counted out.

The fight for the citizens' ticket grew so strong, however, that the republicans did finally take Mr. Estey.

It was ours to be there just before the battle.

The meeting Saturday afternoon before election was composed largely of women, but seventeen new members were added to the W. C. T. U. and good work done. Sabbath afternoon a grand audience assembled, and the meeting was most enthusiastic.

In the evening the out-pouring of the people was said to exceed anything before seen in that city.

The ladies resolved to hold an all day meeting on Monday, (election day) and the result of the campaign was the election of Mr. Estey, the temperance candidate. It was the people against the saloon and bad order, for the union party have no organization there.

Decatur has prohibition by local option under the law for incorporate villages, and how Tekonsha follows on, the town board absolutely prohibiting the sale of intoxicating drinks in the corperation limits. There are victorics in many other towns in the state.

Intense interest prevails everywhere among the people and such an awakening of conscience as has not been before.

The politicians are very much troubled. It is heart-rending to read of the utter failure of prohibition in Maine, Iowa and Kansas, as set forth in the party journals, but the heart of the people beats for the home, and the children. We can safely appeal from courts, legislatures, and parties to the people who make or unmake them all.

A trip of a week through Gratiot county arranged by Mrs. T. Thayer, the energetic president, showed the need of getting back from the city centers to the rural voting population, with the truth about the temperance reform. Full houses, thoughtful attention, and earnest conviction was the history of the week. A new union was organized at Elm Hall with twenty-two members, and the foundations laid for another at Riverdale. These towns are in the lumber district of the state.

* * * * * * *

Our Michigan state convention will be held at Flint, from June 3 to 6. We are to have Miss Willard, and our Annie Gordon, also Mrs. M. H. Hunt, who is greatly needed just now in the interest of the new law for scientific temperance instruction.

A clause of this law requires the text books to pass not only the state board of education, but the state board of health. The latter body in session within the past month, refused to commend Dr. Steel's Hygeinic Physiology and approved another book in which all the teaching on alcohol is in an appendix to the work.

This book the board of education very sensibly reject, as not coming within the design, or language of the law; so the question as to a text book is yet undecided. Of course we favor Steel's, and are anxious about the choice which shall be made.

Our coming convention rounds up our first decade and the first evening is to be a historical meeting, with a thank offering to be put back into the state work. We hope to have on the platform that night, all the ex-presidents of the state union. Each having some part in the program.

* * * * * * *

The best abused man in Michigan at present, is Prof. Sam'l Dickie, chairman of the state central committee of the union party. He is personally strong, frank, logical, outspoken and clean; but one would never know him from the way the party papers make his portrait. God give all needed courage for the "combat deepens."

* * * * * * *

It should be noted that in the examination of the murderers, for the brutal tragedy at East Tawas lately; one of the principals testified, that the masks were provided at the saloon from which they went forth to their deed of blood. How long will our country license these centers of danger and crime?

The 2nd and 3d week in May (if spring comes) we expect to spend in the northern part of the state going into the Upper Peninsula. There is a real appetite just now for the work of the W. C. T. U., and organization is easy.

We hope THE UNION SIGNAL will send its best looking representative to Flint, who shall surely have the warmest welcome and best chance in the interest of the National organ. MARY T. LATHRAP.

THE DAY OF PETITIONS NOT PAST.

DEAR UNION SIGNAL:—Upon the first page of THE UNION SIGNAL of April 24, I find three items touching petitions and petition work. The first showing that Ohio through petitions brought about the submission of a prohibitory constitutional amendment, and that in a like effort she failed to secure a like result.

[Mistake here. The article showed that Ohio's effort with the individual voter, brought back returns to the amount of 320,000 votes, while its recent efforts with the Ohio legislature amounting to 200,000 signatures to petition, brought only the insult of submitting to the people a graded license amendment.—ED.]

The article closes, "Women of the W. C. T. U. do you not see where effort pays?" Permit us to reply that we do; that all the work we have done has never paid as did the petitioning last year, and the work of the past winter has opened the eyes of the people as nothing else has done. We believe in petitioning and cannot agree with the statement of article No. 2 that "the day of petition is over." Our experience does not show "that only failure awaits" their circulation. We "go direct to the people" with our petitions thus reaching and educating more than we possibly can by any other means.

Is there not danger when the National W. C. T. U. believes in petitions, when Pennsylvania is circulating petitions for temperance education, when Ohio is just planning a new petition campaign that our UNION SIGNAL by pressing Illinois conclusions may discourage others? We do not complain of Illinois' action, she has a right to do as may seem to her well, but we implore the national organ to do nothing to dishearten any state which may deem petitioning wise. We voice our own thought, and the wails that come to us from others.

Sincerely yours,
MARY A. WOODBRIDGE.

A TRUE STORY OF HOW A LITTLE GIRL EMPTIED THE JUG.

BY FANNIE BOLTON.

In one of the homes on a little b ck street
A father and mother were sitting at meat,
There was bread and potatoes and plenty to eat,
But alas! into glasses all crystal and clear,
They poured from a pitcher the brown foaming beer.

Then in came a dear little girl. In her hand
She carried a card from her temperance band;
But her sweet face was troubled. "Oh! papa, my dear,
Please don't ever send me for any more beer,
It's awful bad stuff and t'will hurt you I fear.

I have promised this day not to touch it again,
It has caused so much sinning and sorrow and pain,
That I just hate the sight of it. Please papa, dear,
Don't ask me to go any more for your beer,
And I wish you would sign the pledge with me here."

The father and mother laughed loud at their pet,
And told her she'd turn out a lecturer yet;
But the next time they wanted some beer they just said,
"Please go to the corner for vinegar red,
And give this small note to the clerk, Mr. Ned."

The dear little girl started off with a song
Nor dreamed there was anything said that was wrong,
She asked for the vinegar, acid and strong,
Gave the note to the clerk, who smiled and said, "Dear,
Pray hand me the jug" and then went to the rear
And filled it right up from a keg of brown beer.

The little one started to take the jug back,
But just as she ran to the great railroad track,
The cork gave a start and flew out with a crack.
A whiff of the odor of beer reached her nose,
She stopped in amazement, and what do you s'pose?

"Why, that is'nt vinegar, smells very queer,
It's naught in the world but that horrid old beer.
What a stupid! Well, no! I just won't take it back,
The horrid old stuff must be spilled on the track,
And out it came gurgling with snort and with smack.

Then home ran the maiden and told without fear
How Ned didn't know vinegar from brown beer.
"And where is the beer?" said her father, "no doubt
We can manage to use it." "I poured it all out," Laughed the brave little girl, "and its gone up the spout."

"Why! why! what was that for?" said her father, annoyed,
Then the child with his whiskers half playfully toyed.
"Well you see," said his pet in a sweet bird like note,
"That beer jug is spoiling my temperance vote,
And I thought 'twas better spilled there than spilled down your throat."

The father grew sober in deep painful thought,
And spelled out the lesson his little one taught.
"I never will send you again my sweet dear,
Just bring me your pledge, I will sign it right here,
And we'll never drink whisky again or brown beer."

Well was'nt she happy! she laughed and she cried,
Her mother just kissed her and called her, her Pride,
And so they got married—Oh! no,—Let me see
That isn't the end of this story of glee;
But they lived happy after as happy could be.

"I WANT TO VOTE FOR MY PA!"

"Good morning my little man; and who will you vote for today?" So said a neighbor to little Jimmie Lambert, a brave five year old. It was village election day, and the neighbor was on his way to the polls. Jimmie straightened himself up, and was puzzled but for a moment; a bright thought struck him.

"I—I'm going to vote for my pa," he said, as if there could be no doubt about the propriety of that.

"I guess you are hardly big enough," replied the man laughing, "but you might try."

Jimmie's old plays suddenly grew stale. Here was a new thing that men were doing, and he wanted to do the same; for all play is but an imitation of real life, whether it be the play of children in the nursery or of grown up people on the stage. But he was sorely puzzled how to do it, and after trying several things, and calling them voting, he said to his little sister, fourteen months younger than himself:

"Mamie, le's go an' vote down town," and off they went. But mamma saw them. Now Mrs. Lambert was somewhat out of temper that day, for Mr. Lambert, while fuddled with beer at the saloon, had just made a peculiarly unfortunate bargain. He had traded his cow, one main support of his family, for a washing machine which some smooth tongued guzzler assured him would do their washing before breakfast—meaning, of course, if they commenced early enough! Mrs. Lambert was kneading bread and brooding over this matter when she spied the two children just turning into the street.

"Jimmie!" she cried, "James Henry! Do you hear me? Come into the house."

James Henry obeyed, though reluctantly.

"I'm goin' to vote for pa," he said by way of apology.

"I wish you would vote for him," retorted Mrs. Lambert, as she went into the pantry after some flour, "that he wouldn't have any saloon to go to."

This was taken at once by Jimmie as his mother's permission to do the voting, forthwith, and slipping out of the door he was soon on his way to the town hall, carefully leading Mamie by the hand.

The usual question of license or no license was before the people, and as the contest was expected to be very close the excitement ran high. Each side had computed its forces, and was seeing their last man was brought in. The large room was full of men looking on, passing tickets, keeping tally of the voters, or discussing the situation in loud tones. Jimmie, still holding Mamie's hand, timidly twitched a man's coat, and looked up in his face.

"I want to vote for my pa," he said.

"You are too small, my little man, to—"

"Who is it?" cried a second.

"Sam Lambert's children," responded some one.

"Lobbying for a new candidate!"

"Give him a vote!"

"Give the boy a chance!"

So ran the exclamations around the room.

"Give us a speech," said a brawny gunsmith. "What office does your pa want?" And so saying he stood the children side by side upon the judges' table. All were hushed for a moment, in expectation of something to cause fresh merriment. Some who had just come in stood with their ballots in their hands, enjoying the diversion with the rest.

"Poor little things!" said one in a sympathizing whisper, as if to suggest that the play had gone far enough. Jimmie's lips trembled, but he managed to say:

"I want to vote for my pa."

"Shimmie's doin' to tote for our pa," repeated Mamie, in a prompt, clear voice, "so'e won't do to s'loon!"

The merriment was over. An almost painful awe crept over that assembly of men, as if in the voice of helpless childhood they had heard the voice of God.

"Won't none of yez help these babies?" cried an Irishman. "Sure an' I've a moind to help 'em meself."

"Give 'em some tickets!" shouted a voice. It was a happy thought, and no sooner said than done.

"I'll count for yez, me little man," continued the Irishman, and he took a ballot from Jimmie's hand, folded, and voted it. Then what a wild hurrah went up from that crowd! An officer rapped for order.

"The boy has voted, now; who'll vote for the little girl?" cried the gunsmith.

"That's me!"

"I'm another!"

"I'm your man, little one!" And three hands were outstretched for ballots, drawing them from Mamie's closed fist.

Another cheer went up!

"You must remove the children, gentlemen, and stand back a little," commanded one of the judges, rising. As they were being lifted down another cheer arose, with cries of "Good!" "That's it!" and all eyes were turned to the cornet band teacher's blackboard, on which a local artist was sketching, in outline, the two children, with an inscription over and under, like this:

VOTERS, ATTENTION!

"PLEASE VOTE FOR OUR PA, SO'E WON'T GO T S'LOON!"

In vain did the other side try to dampen the enthusiasm. The children triumphed, and the prohibition board was elected by thirty-one majority. And so Jimmie did vote for his pa, and won!—Our Church Banner.

A BOY'S POEM.

BY FRANK G. BLUETT.

(Member of Cheney (W. T.) Band of Hope.)

The soul grows strong in noble strife,
This is the law forever,
Be it the motto of thy life,
Endeavor! Oh endeavor.

Strive for the mastery of self,
From all low aims to sever,
From passion, pride and love of pelf,
Endeavor and endeavor.

Let thy mind entertain the good,
Corrupt guests harbor never,
Feed on high thought, 'tis angels' food,
Endeavor. still endeavor.

Spurn all the blandishments of sin,
But follow virtue ever.
Her smile 'tis blessedness to win,
Endeavor, aye endeavor.

WHILE YOU MAY.

BY MRS. D. LANDON.

Children gather round the hearth-stone,
Baby-voices, soft and sweet;
Hall and porch and stairway, echo
To the tread of tiny feet.
But a morrow cometh, surely,
When each tender lamb will stray;
Time, or Death, will pluck each blossom,
Love the children, while you may!

Rapid, warm, Youth's sun-bright river
Leaps adown the shimmering strand;
Rich and fair the red wine gloweth,
Held by Beauty's lovely hand.
Quick sands quake, beneath the pebbles,
Caution, brother, watch and pray!
Poison bubbles with the nectar;
Pause, and ponder while you may!

Manhood bends beneath his burdens,
Burdens borne for others' needs.
Life for him, is strong and earnest,
Spent in sowing choicest seeds
For the good of coming ages.
If you feel his worth today,
If you prize his God-like spirit,
Let him know it, while you may.

While you may! Ah, words of warning,
How the hurrying flood of years
Sweeps away our holiest treasures,
Leaving only dust and tears!
Starry eyes grow dim and faded;
Locks of gold are ashen grey;
Helpful hands grow strangely feeble.
Share their labors, while you may!

We are pilgrims, brothers, pilgrims,
Journeying oft, o'er burning sand,
Let us cheer each other onward,
With our honest heart and hand.
Vain the tardy recognition
Proffered o'er the slumbering clay:
Let us love, and help our brother
While he needs it—while we may!

THE F. I. T. F.

BY ZELOTA MATHER GARNER.

Hospitality is a part of Richard Raymond's religion. "Always put on an extra plate, my dear," he said to his wife, pretty Mollie Lee that was, when they first began housekeeping. it shows the will is right, tho' there be no guest to honor it."

And when Christmas came he said:

"Two plates this time Mollie dear, I have found two people who will have no Christmas dinner unless we divide ours with them."

"Richard Raymond is a self made man," as the phrase goes. Orphaned at an early age there were no Christmas dinners for him or his little sister Virginia. Many a time on Christmas eve, had the two children stood on tiptoe, their little cold noses pressed against the frosty glass of the shop windows, to catch a glimpse of the gorgeous display of good things which "Santa Claus" held in reserve for good boys and girls.

"Of course it's cause we ain't good! Of course it is, Sissy Ginger!" (her own lisping contraction for Virginia,) but when I grow to be a man, and get a shop some day, I'll keep things for bad boys and girls.

Richard Raymond has grown to be a man, a rich man, too, but he has never forgotten his resolves.

In his beautiful home are two daughters and a son. Richard the II. is a bright, active, wayward boy of fifteen. Florence is nineteen, and Sissy Ginger, named for her aunt Virginia, is seven. "Pretty Mollie Lee, that was," is a silver haired matron now, ready at all times to see and hear her husband's generous plans for the benefit of those who who have not so much of this worlds wealth as themselves.

"A model home" Richard's friends are wont to say; but now and then one more sagacious shakes his head ominously, for oposite the well spread table an elegant side board displays cut glass, and decanters of choice liquors, and the generous host is known to "take a little occasionally for his stomach's sake."

The family have just finished breakfast. It is a bright, cheery room, and the table still contains an "extra plate for one."

Richard Raymond is looking over the morning mail.

"A letter from aunt Virginia!" he exclaims, she accepts our conditions. We will spend Christmas with her."

When his sister had sent her invitation her brother replied—

"Certainly my dear, we shall be delighted; but you know our rules. Can you take us double?"

"Double or quadruple," returned aunt Virginia. So it was settled.

"Now who are to be our guests?" said the father. "It yet lacks two weeks of Christmas; but it is time we were decided. Mamma and I have concluded to give Brock and his wife the pleasure. Poor fellow! he has had a snug time of it this year. He's working very hard, and his wife has been sick most of the time. She is better now and the change will do her good. Brock is a treasure, I shall increase his salary another year. I must manage also to have his desk lighted by sunlight. Writing all day by gas is ruining his eyes."

"Mamma thinks I had better invite Miss Hargrave, my music teacher," said Florence. She has no friends in the city, save her pupils. She is working very hard to help support a sister who is insane. Indeed her history is quite a remarkable one. She has confided it to Mamma."

"Well, Sissy Ginger, upon whom do you bestow your favors?" asked her father.

"I have invited Lilly Belle Brewster. She's lame and has no father or mother, or anybody in the world to love her. She lives with Judge Dean's people; but they are going away for Christmas, and Mrs. Dean said "she didn't know what ever they could do with Lilly Belle while they were gone; trouble always came of having such trash around."

"I don't think she is trash with such a pretty name, so there! Miss Smily says 'she can learn as fast as Jane Dean, and she behaves in school a good deal better.'"

"All right, Pussy, we can find a place for her, and no mistake," said Richard Raymond, his memory running back to his own forlorn childhood. "What is it for, all this ado about the birth of our Savior, if it is not to make dull eyes bright and sad hearts light? And now, my son, whom have you fixed upon?"

"I would like, sir, to invite Mr. Pulsifer, our teacher; but I don't know as he would go. Will Graham says he don't believe he would. Will says he don't go visiting much 'cause he has but one suit of clothes and they are awful shiny at the knees. It's awful, how hard he studies. I wouldn't just for the sake of being at the head of my class. Splitting rails is nowhere to never having a minute you can call your own. You see he's poor and hasn't money to go to college with and so he is teaching and trying to keep up with his classes besides. Of course he can't leave his books a minute. It's Virgil and Homer, and Homer and Virgil, and logarithms and stumparithims too, I suppose. Don't believe it pays, just for the honor of having your name followed with a few letters of the alphabet."

"Not much danger of the alphabet being mutilated for your benefit, is there, Dick?" said Florence.

"Not if I can't have a breathing spell as often as Christmas comes, there isn't."

"I should not think Mr. Pulsifer could do justice to his school and study so hard," continued Florence.

"I don't know what you call justice. I know we fellers all think he is a 'brick' of a teacher."

"Hard, do you mean?"

"Well, may be brick don't express it, Flo; but you know I never cared a straw for my books till Mr. Pulsifer came. None of us fellers did. We'd all planned to run away if the board put another dose of pepper crabs and vinegar to rule over us."

"So Mr. Pulsifer isn't pepper crabs and vinegar?"

"You are right he isn't."

"Has he no friends with whom he can spend Christmas?"

"A fellow two hundred miles away from his relations, and no money to go to them with isn't likely to have, is he?"

"I should presume not," said Richard Raymond. I think you may venture to invite him my son. I have been thinking of making his acquaintance for some time. I think he must be a superior teacher. You have certainly improved under his instruction. I trust however, he will be able to tone your language down a little. Let me see, this is Wednesday. You may invite Mr. Pulsifer, say Friday evening. That will give you time to invite another should he refuse. I rather think he will go."

It is Friday evening. The schools are closed for the usual holiday vacation. A dozen boys remain for a meeting of the F. I. T. F. There are to be two initiations. The proceedings of the meeting are a mystery except to those who will honestly and solemnly come under the rules and assume the obligations of the F. I. T. F.

"You'd better join it," said Billy Metcalf to Tom Jones. "I tell you it's got the sand in it. It'll make a rich man of you, like enough some day. It would be a good thing for our fathers if they'd join it."

"Does it cost money?" asked Tom Jones.

"Well, yes some, but it pays a fellow right back again. I've found a couple of extra dimes in my wallet, every night since I joined it. It pulls on a fellow's grit though, a little, I can tell you."

Tom thought the "extra dime" would be all right, but he didn't know about the pluck. He had been suffering untold misery the last week, for the lack of pluck to have a tooth extracted. "He didn't know, he'd think about it."

At last the teacher is alone. The scholars parted from him with reluctance. Boys who had never kept in school except by severe compulsion, regretted that two weeks must elapse before they could resume study. It was with many misgivings that Charles Pulsifer had applied for the school of H., but necessity compelled him to interrupt his course of study for a year that he might earn money with which to complete it. He was in advance of his class, and by hard study while teaching, and allowing himself no privileges while a senior, he still hoped to graduate with his class.

"Now for two weeks of uninterrupted hard study! I have not accomplished much for myself thus far, unless it be the discipline in the exercise of patience. The school was pretty well demoralized. How could it be otherwise? The school board I understand have been rigidly opposed to any moral instruction in the school. When will those who have control of educational affairs learn that mental growth will avail little unless supplemented by a cultivation of the moral nature and that the two cannot be separated. The last teacher was given to intemperance and not only set a perverse example, but actually taught some of his boys to use beer and tobacco. But I believe I have the youngsters on the right track now. The F. I. T. F. was a happy thought. It now numbers a score of the wildest specimens of young America it has been my chance to meet. Most of them are rich men's sons too! What a pity they cannot appreciate their advantages!

TOPIC: THE UPROAR AT EPHESUS.

LESSON TEXT.—Acts 19: 23-41.

GOLDEN TEXT.—Why do the heathen rage and the people imagine a vain thing?

TIME.—A. D. 57.

PLACE.—Ephesus.

1. "Our craft is in danger" is the rallying cry of organized saloon keepers. Nothing so quickly moves people as danger, first to life and second to property. The shrine-makers were Paul's opponents because his teaching would deplete their purses. The liquor traffic fights the temperance reform for the same reason.

2. There is very apt similitude between the craft of the silversmiths of Ephesus and that of the liquor dealer of today. The image of Diana so largely sold and at such profit was inartistic and ugly. It resembled the Hindoo idol more than a Greek statue. It was the occasion of large expenditure with no return of beauty or profit—and yet its dealers organized for resistance could create a vast amount of uproar and disturbance.

3. Their plea that if the great goddess Diana be deposed from her magnificence the whole of Asia would suffer in prestige, is another point of resemblance to those who in this day and land claim that if the $900,000,000 revenue to the "craft" from the sale of intoxicating liquors were destroyed by the preaching of prohibition, the nation must suffer financial ruin. A great temple to Diana had been built in Ephesus by all the Greek cities of Asia and this would be, in case Christianity triumphed, "of none effect." A great national revenue to the government amounting to $100,000,000 has been built up in America. It is claimed by the "craft" in this country that if prohibition prevails, the government will lack means to carry out its trusts.

4. Personal interest and Christian philanthropy clash hardly often, and it is painful to note that selfishness and its clamor is incompatible with fair play and justice. The very clamorers for rights will not grant others their rights. The silversmiths create such an uproar that Paul cannot be heard in his own defense. The personal liberty doctrines of today would subvert all our national customs and observances.

5. "God sees from the high blue heaven." He watches and delivers. Justice and judgment are the habitation of His throne, therefore riot and clamor ceases; the popular sense of righteousness is wakened by His touch and even mobs disperse, quelled by a breath of His indignation. The triumph of righteousness is as sure as His being.

"Right is right, since God is God,
And right the day must win,
To doubt would be disloyalty
To falter would be sin!"

PLEDGE OR PETITION—WHICH?

For the past ten years the Woman's Christian Temperance Union, with a purpose still unrepresented in national affairs, has carried on the work of petitioning all governmental bodies from congress down, for the recognition of the principle of prohibition. There lies before us at this writing a petition bearing the date of 1874, asking congress for such restrictive legislation as shall limit the importation, manufacture, and use of alcohol to the arts and to mechanical, chemical and medical purposes, in the District of Columbia and the territories.

This petition numerously signed and duly presented has been followed by hundreds, yes, thousands like unto it in general character, in every state in the nation. Instances of favorable reception and consideration of these various petitions are so rare as to prove them but the exceptions to the general rule of ignoring or denial. The documents presented to congress and the various state legislatures during the last decade, asking for some form of this restrictive legislation, would in very deed erect "towers and bastions" of expressed sentiment around every legislator in the land, but alas! of such frail structure and material that they disappear without smoke even, under the hot blaze of self interest.

Following this train of events two questions must come to a thoughtful mind.

Is this effort accomplishing anything in the direction whereto it is sent? And,

Is it the wisest and most economical expenditure of effort in that direction?

In answer to the first, one must admit that the end sought by this means is not yet reached, but common candor will compel the admission that it is much nearer for this effort. Petitions addressed to government; if not effective there have nevertheless awakened and educated the people. They have brought thousands to the "arrest of thought," and conviction has followed honest consideration.

The general uplift of popular feeling on the question of total abstinence and prohibition is without doubt due to the circulation of these various petitions more than to any other one cause. Petition necessitates individual commitment and personal effort, even if it be no more than is required in writing one's name. We give the petition all honor in the temperance campaign of the last ten years. It has been as the ax to the forest, the plow to virgin soil.

But now comes the second question. It is the question of the hour, especially in W. C. T. U. effort: Does petition pay best now?

We have a new weapon furnished ready to our hand. It is the Voter's Pledge. Its use proceeds on the basis of already worked-up sentiment which only needs organization and application to be effective. It makes direct attack upon the government by way of the unit of government—the individual voter. It secures not his adherence to a request made to some supposed higher authority, but to a pledge of personal action. It says, "I," the millionth part of the government, "hereby promise to vote for such and such men and measures," and then goes on to secure the assent of the nine hundred and ninety-nine thousand, nine hundred and ninety-nine other millionths to the same action.

All that the petition has done in years past in the way of educating and concreting temperance sentiment, the Voter's Pledge will do in tenfold measure, because it commits the person signing not only to opinion but to performance in accord with that opinion. The value of that performance must then perforce be the measure of the larger effect of pledge work. Suppose that in the present national campaign, a petition of a million names to be presented to political parties asking for a prohibition plank in the party platforms could be replaced with a document showing the names of 900,000 voters pledged to vote for that party only which shall so incorporate prohibition in its body of political doctrine; which would most speedily secure the attention and favorable action of these conventions? This practical test may be applied to every phase of petition effort with equal fairness and truth.

Considerations such as these, and observation of the petition work in many localities have forced upon us these conclusions. They are not necessarily "Illinois conclusions" as our Ohio correspondent intimates, because formed in Illinois. They may not be the conclusions of the whole country at this writing, but they are in our opinion legitimate and just in view of the ten years' history of nearly unanswered petitions.

The president of the Board of Directors of the Woman's Temperance Publication Association, (Mrs. T. B. Carse) herself a most successful solicitor of stock subscriptions to The Union Signal, commends to all state presidents who have undertaken to raise $500 of stock, the following circular, sent out to all local unions of the state, by the president of the Massachusetts W. C. T. U.

At the annual convention of the N. W. C. T. U., at Detroit, in October last, it was proposed by the president of the Womans' Temperance Publication Association, (Mrs. T. B. Carse, of Chicago,) "That books, containing twenty shares of stock in THE UNION SIGNAL, be placed in the hands of each state president, for sale, and that the person or local W. C. T. U. purchasing said stock be allowed to pay for the same in monthly or quarterly installments."

This proposition met with a hearty response, and a large number of books were taken. She assured us that with the sale of several thousand dollars' worth of stock, and a greatly increased subscription list, there was no reason why said stock should not be a paying investment. The par value of these shares is $25 each. "If only twenty state presidents would sell the amount of stock given them, it would aggregate $10,000, a sufficient sum to tide THE UNION SIGNAL over until the stock begins to pay a dividend." Mrs. Carse also adds, in her annual report: "There should be no difficulty in selling the stock even if there is no higher motive than a desire to make a little money, for our paper in a little while is going to be a paying investment. One reason why the stock has not been more readily sold previously, was on account of a misunderstanding in regard to the law governing corporate bodies. Under the laws of Illinois the stock of corporations held by individuals is assessable only until fully paid up, by the purchaser. No stockholder can be made liable further than this for the debts of a corporation." In view of these facts, I have authorized Miss Elizabeth S. Tobey, of Boston, to take one of these books, containing twenty shares, and sell them in Massachusetts.

I earnestly hope that the local unions and individual members of them will at once invest in one or more shares each, and thus, not only advance the cause in which we are so deeply interested, but also, aid those women who have been carrying this heavy burden so bravely.

(Signed) MARY A. LIVERMORE,
President W. C. T. U. of Mass.

We are permitted to say that this circular has accomplished most speedily "that whereto it was sent," the entire twenty shares assigned to Massachusetts having been taken during a few weeks of Miss Tobey's faithful labors and Mrs. Livermore's inspiring co-operation. Missouri also has taken nearly all of its assignment, one lady, Mrs. Judge Baker of Springfield Mo., subscribing for four shares ($100) in memory of her sainted father, a life long reformer in the days of the unpopularity of reform, Mrs. Clara Hoffman, the state president, taking four more, and others scattering.

Miss Willard and Miss Gordon have fairly flown through New England, the Middle and Western states during the last three weeks. Washington, D. C., and Charleston, W. Va., have had their share of time and now they are in Indiana, Richmond being their pou sto today. The remainder of the week will also be given to Indiana, then Rest Cottage holds them for a very brief space I judge, as I hear of flutterings through Wisconsin, back to Indiana, to Michigan, to Missouri, et al.

Mrs. Ellen M. Watson, the indefatigable insinuator of temperance into the week of prayer, is again in the field for 1885, asking all church and temperance organizations to unite in a call upon the International Committee of the Evangelical Alliance for one whole day for temperance in that ever blessed week. I am sure the W. C. T. U. will "unite" everywhere to do her bidding, and will hasten to get all local churches to join in the request.

Speaking of this work, it seems to me the W. C. T. U. puts too much on one slender pair of shoulders, in asking Mrs. Watson to do all this work without the help of state superintendents. Why are the states regardless of so important a branch of the service?

The laurels of New York and Rhode Island will not suffer Pennsylvania to sleep, and the W. C. T. U. of the state have started out in the campaign for scientific temperance instruction. Mrs. J. D. Weeks is the wise organizer of the campaign. Mrs. Hunt is engaged "for the war," and her "white plume" will soon be seen waving at the head of the advancing column. Blessings on these women, rank and file!

The Cleveland women have just passed the anniversary of their memorable crusade, beginning April 30, 1874. Mrs. Ingham, who had charge of the crusading bands at that time has given me this summary of the work of those eventful days: "Three different pledges were circulated, viz.: citizens', dealers' and property owners.' Citizens' signatures, 10,000; dealers', 315; property owners', 200. Number of women enrolled, exclusive of the two young ladies' leagues, 2,500. We visited three distilleries, eight breweries, thirty drug stores, thirty-five hotels, forty wholesale dealers, one thousand one hundred saloons, many of these more than once. We were admitted into four hundred and fifty places, and held seventy outdoor services, besides conducting meetings in a number of warehouses and offices in which we were invited to pray for neighboring liquor sellers refusing us admission."

Nasby has found out how much "trubble" women can make. At the Corners, Issaker Gavitt's wife one night took him home drunk and he struck her on the way.

"Hevins!" said she, "ef we only cood do suthin," chokin with teers and pashun, "it's quick enuff we'd shut up sich holes ez yoorn!" This to Bascom!

The remark wuz full uv menin to me. Issaker and the others who spend most uv their time and all uv their money with Bascom agreed with me that nothin cood be so dangerous to our libertias ez women. They haven't the reasonin' faculties of men, and havn't the stiddiness necessary to the proper exercise uv the governin function. Bascom's customers hev often commenced the discushen uv this question, and wood, doubtliss, hev struck out suthen startlin ef they cood hev kept sober long enuff to hev developed their ideas; but this I know, that every man who frekents his bar is opposed to women, ceptin at home in their place.

I see that the temperance folk of New South Wales are greatly interested in the prohibition experience of Pullman. They have written to the officials asking such questions and receiving such answers as these:

"In what year was the city of Pullman founded?
"Answer: 27th May, 1880.
"What is the population at present?
"Answer: 7,500.
"How many churches does it contain?
"Answer: Five
"How many schools also, and teachers employed?
"Answer: Two school buildings, and thirteen public school teachers.
"How many lockups or gaols?
"Answer: None.
"Number of magistrates, with amount of salaries?
"Answer: None.
"Number of police, and their cost?
"Answer: One, at £12 a month.
"What is the annual amount spent on relief of the poor?
"Answer: Nothing.
"Can you furnish us with your statistics of crime?
"Answer: We have no crime.
"Have you any asylumns, such as those for lunatics, orphans, benevolent, etc.?
"Answer: None.
"Is the trade in strong drink prohibited?
"Answer: Sale of malt, vinous, and spirituous liquors forbidden.
"Do you attribute to the absence of facilities for getting drink and improved state of morals, as compared with other cities in your state?
"Answer: We certainly do, as one important aid in this direction."

ON DUTY.

News From the Field.

IOWA.

DAVENPORT.—I want to say a word about our Band of Hope, which is going on to a glorious success. There are over two hundred of as bright and intelligent children as the city affords. One class composed of boys from twelve to sixteen years of age numbers over twenty.

We have just had an entertainment by Mrs. Nelly Bayley, which was very interesting to young and old and decidedly profitable. N. S. B.

CONNECTICUT.

MYSTIC.—At a meeting of the Mystic branch of the W. C. T. U. it was resolved that while we bow submissively to the Divine will in all the affairs of life, we mourn with unaffected sorrow the great loss that we have sustained in the death of the beloved and faithful president of our union, Mrs. Desire M. Schoonover, whose devoted and untiring labors in the great cause she loved so well, made her a shining example for us all, leaving a life work that has shone brightest in her own home, and illumined her every walk of life.

MINNESOTA.

SAUK RAPIDS.—We have just had our sixth gospel temperance meeting. They have all been well attended and very successful in every way, and though but a small society of eighteen members organized nine months ago, we have ample proof that our society has done good and not to ourselves alone, even our newspaper, though not very favorable, has given us unasked a "local habitation" and the name we rejoice in. Four of our ladies have prepared essays for our meetings and we also usually take charge of the opening services, the children, of course, assisting with songs and recitations. We are promised a temperance sermon in the Episcopalian church and are to have a lecture from Mrs. Anderson soon. AN ANGLO MEMBER.

VERMONT.

MONTPELIER.—The executive committee of the W. C. T. U. of Vermont met at Montpelier April 18. Among the subjects pleasantly and profitably discussed was the one of finance. Unions were urged to make an effort to increase their membership, and also membership fees; to secure honorary members; also associate members, who should become such by payment of fee even if they did not sign the pledge. Institute work was profitably discussed. This bids fair to be very successful.

The department of Scientific Instruction is doing a good work; some unions have found it a grand success to offer prizes to the pupils of the town who would pass the best examination in Julia Colman's "Catechism on Alcohol," having the examination and awarding of prizes public, and giving an entertainment with it which would interest and instruct a large audience.

We are very happy to report that one public school teacher in Washington county uses THE UNION SIGNAL for an exercise in light reading in her class of forty scholars of average age of twelve years, and occasionally reads them the story from it, upon the memory of which they are required to base their compositions. May this be a timely suggestion to other teachers of Vermont, and if a teacher of Vermont can so happily utilize this paper why may not those of other states go and do likewise.

Effort is being made to assist the state superintendent of Scientific Instruction to introduce Steel's Hygienic Physiology into all the schools of Vermont.

MRS. F. A. KEZER, Supt. Union Signal Work.

WASHINGTON TERRITORY.

DAYTON.—I write thinking it would be of interest to you and your numerous readers to hear from our union here in this remote portion of the field. We have a local union of forty members, hold weekly meetings for prayer and consultation; also have a Band of Hope numbering one hundred and eighty members, which meets every Sabbath and is conducted on Sunday school plan, using Miss Colman's Catechism, and enlivening the exercises by addresses, recitations, select readings from THE UNION SIGNAL, Captain Deborah's Talks, Mrs. Anna M. Hammer's letters, etc., which are of great interest and encouragement to us all. Our union holds a gospel temperance meeting monthly, the Band of Hope participating, which is a great attraction to all, especially the parents.

We are making preparations to celebrate our first anniversary the 22d of May, of which we hope to be able to give a favorable report.

MRS. L. S. PEACHY, Pres.

CHENEY.—This union is a little more than three years old, a sort of twin to the town, which is also three years old. They have weekly business meetings, and weekly prayer meetings (on Sunday evenings); an active Band of Hope of three years standing, organized by Mrs. Lucy A. Switzer. This Band of Hope is supplied with almost every book on the temperance question which it is possible for children to understand, together with interesting weekly papers. Temperance books are given as prizes for attendance, which ranges from thirty to fifty, weekly. Pictorial pledges have also been placed in the Sabbath schools. Before the schools and academy were opened the W. C. T. U. gave a full set of books for temperance instruction to the schools. Temperance tracts are distributed at every meeting. Temperance papers are subscribed for and sent to the penitentiary and jail.

OREGON.

EUGENE.—We have been organized now just a twelvemonth, and when we look back to our starting place our progress in this W. C. T. U. work seems wonderful, more especially in its reflex influence upon ourselves. Truly God is in this movement, and since we have been so blessed we should surely express our gratitude, so that other young unions may be encouraged and strengthened, and thus the good work helped on.

We may well congratulate ourselves upon our members, a band of working women, noble and true, and still increasing. Our various departments of work are in the hands of most efficient superintendents, and we know good work is being done.

Should you ask our ladies what they are doing, I think they would say "We are sowing the seed for prohibition among young and old alike, and in various ways. We are also studying and discussing among ourselves the problems involved in this liquor question; so that if by next June, "Oregon our Oregon," gives her daughters the ballot, we may know how to use it."

I wonder how many of your readers know that the Hon. John M. Burnett, now president of the bank of California, reported a bill from the judiciary committee, "June 22. 1844." to prevent the introduction, sale and manufacture of ardent spirits in Oregon. "On the 24th of the same month the bill was read a third time and passed." (Oregon archives, 42d page.)

We have a Y. W. C. T. U. from which we hope much. There is a growing interest in this work among the young ladies which is very hopeful.

Mrs. Leavitt has done us great good. Her lectures were a rare treat. The crowded audiences paid marked attention, children and all. Her address on Woman's Ballot was exactly what we needed just now. Her talk to the children and young people was especially to the point, and attentively received. Her discourse on prohibition gave great encouragement, and was especially opportune. We are thankful that such a woman as Mrs. Leavitt was selected by the National officers for work on this coast. A MEMBER.

MICHIGAN.

ST. JOSEPH.—Our little W. C. T. U. band is full of rejoicing and praise to God, for the the manifest answer to prayer in the work done here by Hughes and Ward. And the work still goes on. Every Wednesday evening a temperance meeting is held in the Blue Ribbon Hall, and a few more names added to the pledge each time.

The pledge is being kept by nearly every one who signed it. A deep interest in the work prevades the community.

Our W. C. T. U. gave a hygienic dinner at our Blue Ribbon Rooms recently, which was pronounced a grand success and netted us $35. MRS. E. A. PARCE.

TUSCOLA COUNTY CONVENTION.

The third annual convention of this society for Tuscola county, met at the Baptist church in Caro on April 3. The attendance was good, and the spirit manifested from beginning to end was earnest and unflinching. Reports from the unions in the county and of the juvenile work showed excellent work actually being done. The address of welcome by Mrs. J. F. Seeley, was full of practical thoughts, and an able response was given by Mrs. O. G. Lane, of Vassar. A poem prepared for the occasion was read by Mrs. R. K. Hill, of Vassar, after which Mrs. Dr. Wheat addressed the meeting upon "The Present Outlook of the W. C. T. U."

Mrs. Lathrap gave valuable suggestions on the temptation to boys and girls, also in respect to juvenile work and scientific instruction. In the evening Mrs. Mary A. Lathrap, state president of the W. C. T. U., addressed a large assemblage of people, and pleased everybody.

MRS. L. T. VAN DYKE, Sec.

FENTON.—The recent anniversary service of the Fenton W. C. T. U. was most enjoyable. The address was by Mrs. Johnson, of Flint. Mrs. Jennings read an interesting history of the organization. Mrs. Thompson read an original poem; Mrs. H. B. Latourette gave a fine select reading. The W. C. T. U. is evidently in a flourishing condition and the ladies who have labored so zealously in keeping up the society, deserve the thanks of the entire community for the good they have accomplished.

BIG RAPIDS.—I know all the dear women of Michigan will be glad to know that our superintendent of Kindergarten Work has received a letter from Sarah B. Cooper of San Francisco, stating that she will give a little time to this department of work in our district in July. Her Bible class takes care of six free kindergartens and is about to start the seventh.

SOUTHERN GLEANINGS.

BY MRS. GEORGIA HULSE MCLEOD.

"Maryland, my Maryland," is looking up with the buds and blossoms of spring. The eleventh annual convention of the Maryland state temperance convention just adjourned, was one of the most successful on record. Over six hundred delegates were present. Among the distinguished speakers were Mrs. Mary A. Woodbridge and Col. Bain, who addressed immense audiences each evening.

Miss Willard found time in her journeying to send one of her graceful greetings with good wishes from the N. W. C. T. U., which was received with applause.

Mrs. Woodbridge held a meeting for our girls at which a Y. W. C. T. U. was organized, under the name of the Woodbridge Union.

After prolonged and lively debate the Alliance at its last session, adopted the following resolution over which all good prohibitionists rejoice:

Resolved, That the question of the suppression of the liquor traffic has become one of such vital political importance to the nation as to justify prohibitionists of both the democratic and republican parties requiring of them at their next nominating convention for president and vice president of the United States, to distinctly and positively recognize this question in their respective platforms and nominate candidates who are in accordance therewith; and if both parties will do so, we will not make the question a political one in this presidential campaign, or if either party shall distinctly so do, and the other refuse or decline, we will cast our suffrages for the party thus favoring this question in preference to the one refusing regardless of our present party affiliations. But in case neither party shall recognize this question, we authorize the executive committee of this Alliance at the proper time to place in the field an electoral prohibitory ticket for the state of Maryland, for president and vice president, that shall have been nominated by the prohibitory party of the United States, if in their judgment they deem it best to do so.

SOUTH CAROLINA.—Of Newberry, where Mrs. Chapin has been lecturing, Mrs. E. S. Herbert kindly sends me a report. The W. C. T. U. numbers 115 members; the Band of Hope 117, and an organization among the colored people 234. The best material of the town is actively interested and they may well look for good results from such united "faith and works."

The News and Courier of Charleston, says, "Mrs. Sallie F. Chapin, of this city, has succeeded in arousing intense enthusiasm on the temperance question wherever she goes. She has just closed a week's campaign, having spoken and formed unions in Laurens, Newberry, Edgefield, Hodges, Greenwood, and Lexington, and has added 1,180 names to the roll of membership of the W. C. T. U., and among them some of the most prominent ladies of the state."

MISSOURI.

NEOSHO.—About January 1, Mrs. Clardy spent two days with us and organized a W. C. T. U. with about 12 members. The women went about their work quietly and patiently but earnestly and prayerfully.

For nearly two weeks Mr. C. J. Holt was with us and as a result of the meetings, about five hundred signed the pledge, eighty of them drinking men, and today if you could look upon our streets you could see numbers of them with the blue ribbon on, fearlessly advocating the cause of temperance. And some of them who have not been in a church for years are now found every Sabbath in the house of God.

Mr. Holt also organized a N. C. T. U., and a band of little temperance cadets numbering two hundred and fifty. The W. C. T. U. now numbers seventy-one members.

We gave a supper at the close of Mr. Holt's meetings which was a very enjoyable and successful occasion. Near the close of Mr. Holt's meetings a tabernacle was proposed, and it was resolved unanimously to build one to be owned and controlled by the W. C. T. U. of Neosho.

A lot was immediately secured and about $700 raised. The building when completed will be worth $1.000.

Mr. Joe Critchfield followed Mr. Holt for a week. At the close of his meeting a county convention was called, and two hundred delegates assembled the first day. The W. C. T. U. subscribed for six copies of THE UNION SIGNAL to distribute among the reformed men, and we have besides eleven regular subscribers.

MRS. J. H. HERMS. Pres.

SCHELL CITY.—Our union organized last August by Mrs. Clardy, has steadily increased in numbers, and our weekly meetings in interest. A few weeks ago Mrs. Fixen lectured for us two evenings, sending facts and truths directly home to the hearts of many who had hitherto given the subject of temperance very little thought. We have kept the subject before the people in the temperance column of our paper each week, by means of tract and hand bills, through our Band of Hope, and in other ways, so that the result of Mr. C. J. Holt's work among us was a wonderful revival, over four hundred signed the pledge. Our union more than doubled its members, and a reform club of one hundred and twenty-five of our very best men was organized, our Y. W. C. T. U. also received many valuable additions. A nice hall has been rented as headquarters for all these organizations and as a reading room.

MRS LUCIA A. GARDNER, Sec.

MARIONVILLE.—In January Mr. J. C. Holt spent one week with us, starting the great temperance revival, organizing a W. C. T. U., a C. T. U. and the Band of Hope, all holding their weekly meetings with increasing interest.

We have also had Messrs. Critchfield and McLane besides Mrs. M. Clardy.

We have a department in our local paper giving the news, and workings of the W. C. T. U. each week. A few nights since the ladies of Marionville, under the auspices of the W. C. T. U., gave a basket festival in College Hall which was one of the most enjoyable affairs ever held in our little city.

MRS. M. B. CUSHING, Press Cor. W. C. T. U.

TEXAS.

WHITESBORO.—Since our organization last November we have placed the names of 145 persons on our general roll who have taken the pledge.

The people here are becoming very much interested in the temperance question, and we feel encouraged notwithstanding the saloon keepers are defiant.

Mrs. L. G. Fixen gave fresh impetus to the cause in our town on the evenings of April 4 and 8. Her lectures were convincing to the most sceptical in attendance and her address most pleasing.

Miss Henrietta Moore is to be with us this month.

E. MARCH, Pres.

PARIS.—For the past few days Paris has been in a whirl of patriotic and home protective excitement, consequent on the re-union of the heroes of the Texas revolution on the anniversary of the battle of San Jacinto, and the meeting of the prohibition convention, called on this memorable occasion with the hope of securing the cooperation in the temperance cause of our battle scarred men, who even today, we opine, love liberty better than life. We have had words of welcome, and words of kind response by citizens and visitors, and appeals and unanswerable arguments for the cause of prohibition in such rapid succession "one woman's head cannot contain it all." But the crowning success of the convention was the address of Miss Henrietta G. Moore of Ohio. Miss Moore's address has already been ably reported to the press, but as the closing appeal to the veteran heroes of our Lone Star state was omitted, we ask THE UNION SIGNAL, which is a welcome visitant into many of our Texas homes, to publish the enclosed extract:

"February 24, 1836, Col. W. B. Travis, commanding the Alamo fortress, issued this stirring appeal: 'To the people of Texas and all the Americans in the world: I shall never surrender or retreat, and I call upon you in the name of liberty, patriotism and everything dear to the American character, to come to our aid with dispatch. Victory or death!' And it was death to that brave band of 170 at the Alamo. But it was victory at the San Jacinto. Forty-eight years ago yesterday you again met the treacherous Santa Anna. You turned upon him the two pieces of artillery, "The Twin Sisters," with which Cincinnati, Ohio, had presented you, and Texas muscle and Buckeye thunder forced him to a halt. Texan courage and patriotism received a new inspiration and forty-eight years ago today Santa Anna the tyrant, was in the hands of Sam Houston the conqueror.

"Brave patriots of the past, your country is again imperilled and by a worse foe than a Mexican Santa Anna. Dictator Alcohol sits on the throne, and his reign is destructive of our homes, our lives, our liberties and our happiness. The Woman's Christian Temperance Union appeals to you in the words of 1836, in the name of liberty, patriotism and everything dear to the American character, to come to its aid. It is victory or death to us now. Which shall it be? As at San Jacinto, Lone Star muscle and Buckeye thunder can win the day. Eight thousand 'Twin Sisters,' Buckeye women of the W. C. T. U. are ready with the thunder. Brave veterans of Texas, wearing the scars of the heroic deeds of the past, and with thousands of your comrades lying dead in many a drunkard's Alamo and Goliad, are you ready with the muscle?"

LIZZIE JOHNSON, State Sec.

TEXAS NOTES.

—All hail to the Whitesboro W. C. T. U.! In point of numbers it is the banner union of the state, and, as far as I have information, of the United States.

—At Denison a few noble women keep the fires burning. The consecrated president of this W. C. T. U., not satisfied with the work of a professional poster in advertising my meetings, went out in the rain and in city and suburbs, in store, street-car, on fence and tree, with her own hands put up the posters.

HENRIETTA G. MOORE.

NEW JERSEY.

GLEANINGS BY R. P. PENFIELD.

PLAINFIELD.—Having conquered pneumonia and returned safely to my home, I find that the temperance revival has lost none of its ardor. The red ribbon army has reached three thousand members. After the evangelists Mabee and English left us, our pastors agreed to hold union meetings every Sabbath night in the different churches and much good is being done. Our reformed men's club send delegations to the adjacent towns and cities each Sabbath night, where large and deeply interested meetings are conducted. The club is about eight hundred strong. The W. C. T. U. has restored the pledge to their constitution which had been expunged, in order to bring in workers who were unwilling to take the total abstinence pledge.

For our backsliding we were justly rebuked, as these temperance men could not address a woman's mass meeting under the auspices of an unpledged W. C. T. U. Our union is now holding a union weekly prayer meeting beside its regular meetings. Our Holly Tree Inn is open every Sabbath afternoon to the Reformed Club and much good is being done at that service. Our W. C. T. U. has 249 paying and pledged members, and we hope yet to obtain the name of every mother and daughter in our city. Between thirty and forty of the members of the fire department and steamer No. 2 have joined the red ribbon forces. They have learned that only water can quench the fires of alcohol and so they are doing double duty in our fire department. All our churches and pastors share in this glorious work. St. Mary's total abstinence society has been very active in obtaining pledges. The Dominican priests who held a mission lately here, were earnest advocates of temperance reform.

"Over the range!"
The splendid parable thus we read:
An onward and upward way we lead.
We are starting prepared and provided
That nothing our plans disarrange.
Our paths may at times be divided,
But we camp full of cheer over night,
With summit yet clearer in sight;
Our company all shall unite
"Over the range!"

Died April 21, 1884, in the city of Plainfield, Mrs. Rebecca S. Haviland, a member of the Orthodox Friends' meeting, an estimable woman, socially and religiously. A wise and judicious member of our W. C. T. U., true to its pledge and constitution. We shall miss her presence at our meetings and her quiet and dignified efforts in the gospel temperance work.

NEWARK.—A theatre turned into a gospel temperance hall and dedicated to the service of God! This building was purchased by No. 1 union for $25,000, $1,500 paid down and $7,000 to be paid on the 1st of May, which will be done, and the balance on bond and mortgage. The store's rentals will meet the interest, taxes, etc. Faith in God who has so graciously blessed this union heretofore, provides for the balance. Since their opening services six souls have been brought to Christ and many are asking, What shall I do to be saved? The liquor saloon next door has been closed every Sabbath evening since the dedication, and their faith takes in this saloon as one of the trophies soon to be theirs.

This first W. C. T. U. of Newark and of the state, began their work with nine members, who caught the fire from the western crusaders of ten years ago with dear Mother Hill as president; many have entered into the higher service, others remain, to witness the blessed results of this first decade.

At the Newark conference our beloved state president, Mrs. Downs, was invited to conduct its conference temperance meeting. Miss Willard's talk before this meeting was grand, the clergy were enthusiastic and many said not a man in the conference could have done so well. All praise to Him who has so richly endowed her with such rare gifts (grace, culture, voice and manner) for the position she so sweetly fills. The following week our own Anna M. Hammer addressed the colored M. E. conference on "Communion Wine." The bishop, a dignified and intelligent man, presided; the church was packed and the people attentive.

COLORADO.

DENVER.—Denver has aroused from her slumbers and like a huge lion, awakened in its lair, is defending herself against her foes. Grand men and true are proclaiming temperance truths from the pulpit. The press has opened its columns as never before to items in regard to the work, in some instances publishing almost entire sermons giving no uncertain sound on the all important topic. It has issued 1,000 circulars to pastors, Sunday school superintendents and teachers, asking for more definite teaching in Sunday schools regarding gospel temperance.

[The Denver temperance ticket secured five out of seven candidates. A glorious triumph!—ED. SIGNAL.]

GREELEY is making steadily onward, reaping the results of all her years of prohibition. A very beautiful and prosperous town. It might well be a model for others to follow. A W. C. T. U. district convention has just been held there, addressed one evening by our president Mrs. Shields.

COLORADO SPRINGS the home of our grand Mrs. Shields has a live union.

LEADVILLE writes, Our union is growing in numbers and influence.

BOULDER is awakening to the fact that the liquor traffic is her master and is struggling to release herself. The W. C. T. U. has all these years been at work, and we believe Boulder is reaping some of the fruits of its work. A reading room is kept open by the W. C. T. U. A temperance column furnished to one paper.

We have now 18 unions in the state, three having been organized since the last annual meeting, one at Grand Junction, and one at Buena Vista, organized by Mrs. Shields.

LONGMONT.—We were defeated at the election, but are mourning not as those without hope. There are many things to encourage us. We elected two of the board and two votes changed, or four more prohibition votes, would have given us the majority. Temperance sentiment is becoming stronger and stronger in Longmont, and many thinking men and women have no doubt as to the result another year.

Mrs. Shields organized a union at Elbert, the first of the month. She has been in some of the mountain towns, where she has spoken to crowded houses, and much good is being done by her efforts. She has visited with the exception of two, every union in the state during the last half year and is to come to Longmont for our May meeting. MRS. KITTY D. H. THOMPSON.

FORT COLLINS.—Give God the glory, our hopes and prayers are more than answered; God is better than all our fears.

Our mayor and council with one exception are prohibitionists.

At their first meeting the license question had to be disposed of. They emphatically said, We will not "put our hands to the accursed thing." A rousing mass meeting was held endorsing the action of our city council. The saloons must go after the 28th of this month.

Our cause is marching on. We take none of the honor to ourselves, still the saloonists say the men are all going crazy, and following a few antiquated old women. We say our men are coming to their right mind. Druggists are so firmly bound they will not dare to sell. Also a great many of the so-called patent medicines they are now selling are prohibited.

L. N. MCINTYRE, Pres. W. C. T. U.

LOVELAND.—After the election of 1883 we resolved to work for a prohibition ticket hereafter. Renewing our energies and increasing our prayers we have achieved success. Every member on the prohibition ticket was unanimously elected. Herald the glad tidings! During the winter, hearing that ex-Gov. St. John, of Kansas, would be in the state lecturing, our union determined to secure his services. Two of our noble working force were put on the soliciting committee to raise the needed funds. Never did we have such stinging cold weather, lasting all the time that event was in preparation, yet day after day that committee plodded through the snow, our little village having but few sidewalks. Of that lecture simply permit me to say, how insignificant the price in comparison to the power of making temperance converts. Long live ex-Gov. St. John till the last liquor seller is banished from earth.

For election day, of the various plans proposed our union choose that of prayer beginning at sunrise (before that time ten praying women were at the church.) Of comers and goers there was an average attendance of fifteen to the close of the day. F. B. C., Cor. Sec.

ILLINOIS.

EIGHTEENTH DISTRICT CONVENTION.

The fourth annual convention of this district met in Collinsville April 8. In a review of the year's work we found our unions had doubled, nine having been reported at our last district convention, eighteen at this, with a membership of 350; six Bands of Hope with 520 members; one night school, one industrial school, one mission Sunday school and three coffee and lunch houses. Special prominence was given to the discussion of the three topics: "Medical Testimony against Beer, Tobacco and Alcoholic Prescriptions," "Temperance Instruction in Public Schools," and "Woman's Ballot." Papers were read on each, and the last was discussed on the last evening of the convention by our editor, Mrs. Willard.

The question of finance was by no means neglected. By a unanimous vote the district is pledged to raise $600 during the coming year, to be equally divided between the district and the state work. Mrs. M. C. Morrison, of Alton, was elected district organizer and worker and was instructed to visit schools and labor to secure systematic temperance instruction for the children. Miss Hood greatly endeared herself to us all and rendered excellent service throughout the convention. District officers for the ensuing year are: President, Mrs. E. A. Blair, of Lebanon; secretary, Mrs. P. I. Reynolds, of Greenville; treasurer, Mrs. N. D. Irwin, of Edwardsville.

MRS. M. LEE HOYT.

MADISON COUNTY CONVENTION

held in Troy, March 20. The address of welcome by Mrs. Stewart, the oldest member of our union,—in her 76th year, I think—was most excellent. Mrs. Sparks, of Alton, fittingly responded.

Reports from the six unions represented showed that the work was advancing, if slowly, in southern Illinois.

"The Need of the Hour" was presented by Mrs. H. P. Donoho, of Troy; Rural Work, by Mrs. Phillips, of Nashville; Juvenile Work, by Mrs. Morrison, of Alton; Young Ladies' work, by Mrs. McAllily; Temperance Work in Sabbath Schools, by Mrs. Rawson.

Finance received its due share of attention and the plan recommended in the state plan of work was adopted by hearty and unanimous vote.

The resolutions gave special prominence to Juvenile, Young Ladies, Scientific and German work, cordially favored woman's ballot and urged earnest work for THE UNION SIGNAL.

The evening addresses by Miss West were highly appreciated by all. MRS. IDA BROWN, Sec.

MT. STERLING.—Our city election, April 15, gave us two anti-license aldermen out of three, so our council stands four aldermen anti-license against two for license, with the mayor anti-license.

We have had license for four years, with four saloons putting $3,200 into the city treasury, which was no little thing to fight against, but we have beaten them for one year at least, and I hope longer. I am rejoiced that so many towns in Illinois have gone anti-license this spring. It is evident there is quite a prohibition sentiment growing in this state, and if the legislature ever gives us a chance to vote on the question of a prohibition amendment we will stand a good show to carry it.

J. A. CURRY.

LITCHFELD.—Our union has been growing steadily in numbers and interest for several months past, our membership now being about forty. We hold monthly public meetings, which brings our cause before the public, and has secured us help from many never before reached. Capt. Linscott gave us four days. His thoughts and suggestions were very helpful to us. We quite captivated the children and organized a Band of Hope with one hundred and fifty members, of which we hope to send you cheering news at no distant day.

We have appointed a superintendent of Flower Mission and expect to do much good through that branch of work. We do not feel equal to much but intend doing all we can to agitate and train the children, which will not be little with our Father's blessing.

MARY D. WALLACE, Pres.

DANVILLE.—The pleasant rooms of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union were formally opened to the public on the evening of April 10. The ladies of this union, representing the intelligence and practical Christian zeal of many of the representative homes of Danville, have labored earnestly and indefatigably to fit up attractive headquarters for their organization. The rooms are across the hall from those of the Young Men's Christian Association. Beautifully decorated walls, pictures, easels and panels render these headquarters a most attractive place and reflect credit upon the executive ability that has directed and consummated the plans.

Through the efforts of the ladies the rent has been secured and the union is now in better condition than ever to perform the noble work it has undertaken.

New interest in the work of the union will undoubtedly result from the reception.

ILLINOIS NOTES.

—Mrs. M. J. Mingle, president of the seventh district, reports a union of forty members just organized at Morrison.

—Mr. Alexander Cooper has just closed a week's gospel temperance meetings in Troy. Great interest was manifested and quite a number signed the pledge.

—The North Side union, Chicago, loses one of its most efficient officers and most self-sacrificing and devoted members by the removal of Mrs. Ada R. Hand to Geneva Lake, Wis.

—Mrs. Marion B. Baxter's lecture at Metamora, "The Hand Writing on the Wall," elicited hearty commendation for its "logic and good practical common sense." Mrs. Baxter has been engaged for the Eureka temperance camp meeting in August.

CONNECTI-CUTTINGS.

CLINTON has a magnificent school house on the hilltop and no saloon in its valley. Here I spent last Sabbath addressing the children and young ladies in the afternoon and a thronged union meeting in the evening. Here a wealthy gentleman, a few years since, gave a large fund for the erection of a school building in honor of his birthplace. An endowment fund was added with a specified amount for procuring prizes. I questioned as I saw the troop of bright-faced children schoolward bound, Could his wealth have been more worthily bestowed?

In contrast, I recall another town recently visited, where a man had been called to the account beyond, leaving a fortune of over three millions of dollars, who had never given a dollar for the benefit of the town in which he had lived over eighty years. He could not even afford repairs upon the dilapidated house in which he lived. Could his wealth have been more unworthily hoarded? To me the one represented "Uncle Sam," who is rich enough to educate all his children; the other the selfish greed of the liquor traffic, which pays the taxes it cannot avoid, but confers no honor upon native land, and will find few to weep at its burial.

I hear some rumors of conventions of W. C. T. U. in our vicinity which I trust may be verified.

I am invited to Rochester, N. Y., and vicinity, mid the scenes of my girlhood, to fill some appointments, and subsequently to Worcester, Mass., for the third Sabbath in May, then to home work.

LUCY H. WASHINGTON.

NEW HAMPSHIRE.

The great temperance tidal wave of our country is reaching inland, even to our state capitol. The roar of the waves and the rolling of the waters were never quite so clearly heard in historic Concord as now. A law and order league, which already numbers nearly five hundred, has recently been organized for the real purpose of suppressing the liquor traffic. Effective work has already been entered upon in that direction.

After a union temperance meeting in the South Congregational church, Sunday evening, April 27, addressed by the state president of the W. C. T. U. at which it was estimated more than fifteen hundred persons were present, two hundred and eighty-one ladies joined the Concord W. C. T. U.

The faithful few who have "held the fort" amid great discouragement for nine years are now rejoicing in the victory for God and home and native land. The city pastors are nearly all identified in the movement, and we look for great results.

Lebanon also sings of triumph. One druggist, one hotel keeper and two saloon men have recently met the demands of the law and paid their fines. One man has given up the business. Nor is that all, the sword of violated law hangs by a single hair over the criminal business of all engaged in the illegal traffic. We expect, with God's help to go on to greater victory.

N. H. KNOX.

INDIANA.

NINTH DISTRICT CONVENTION.

The sixth convention of the ninth district W. C. T. U. convened at Westfield April 22. The attendance was unusually large, voters making at least half of the audience. The convention throughout the five sessions was thoroughly alive with a spirit of work and well directed activity, all eager to get and give helpful and tried experiences. There were two exemplary reports one from Stockwell the other from Frankfort, which drew from the delegates a promise of trying to do as well at the next convention. Thirty-six voting delegates present, representing eleven unions and a membership of near four hundred. Twenty-five new members were added to the local union. The sales of literature were brisk. Several shares of our W. C. T. U. stock sold, about thirty subscriptions for our papers secured, divided between THE UNION SIGNAL, Our Herald and The Organizer. Westfield has a history dating back to the days of the underground rail road, and the old spirit seemed to breathe out through the resolutions adopted, demanding woman's ballot and constitutional prohibition, and promising to do our best to defeat any man seeking the place of "trust or power" opposed to these measures.

MARY E. BALD, Treas.

PENNSYLVANIA.

SHARON.—We have the honor of being "one of the first," unions or leagues in Pennsylvania, organized March 17, 1874, have kept alive ever since. Hold our meetings every two weeks. Held five public meetings under the auspices of W. C. T. U. the past year, and joined with other societies in several others. Feby. 17 and 22, we had that prince of temperance speakers, John B. Finch, and arranged to have him back in May, but his illness has prevented his coming. We also expected Mrs. McLaughlin, of Boston, in May but could not secure her until August. Our county corresponding secretary has secured her for this county from Aug. 29 to Sept. 5. Our union expects one or more lectures. We also have a promise of long standing from Miss Willard, and as she has reserved for those we hope to hear her.

We have just had a good lecture from David Tatum, of Cleveland, Ohio. He does not believe in men praying "Thy kingdom come," and then voting the devil's kingdom to stay, and I am glad to say half the audience agreed with him, not half the voters.

We are now engaged in circulating petitions for a law requiring scientific temperance instruction in our public schools. Mrs. Hunt will speak in Greenville, this county, in May on this subject. Our county superintendent of the department will furnish each election district with petition, tablets and we hope to be successful. Mrs. J. W. Stevenson, and state superintendent of literature has published and circulated hundreds of slips "Work for 1884, by John B. Finch." Each local union is asked for $1, to furnish these and other tracts which they purpose distributing to aid our work.

MRS. A. P. HAMILTON.

VERMONT.

PRIZE TEMPERANCE ESSAYS.

BURLINGTON.—The prizes offered by the ladies of the W. C. T. U. to the children of the high and grammar grades of our public schools, for the best essays on the subject of the harmful effects of intoxicating liquors and narcotics, were awarded at a public meeting in city hall and the successful essays were read by their writers.

The prizes aggregated $60, and were apportioned in sums of from $4 to $10, according to the grade of the successful competitors.

In spite of the disagreeable weather, a large audience was present. The exercises of the evening consisted of remarks by Superintendent H. O. Wheeler and Rev. Dr. Brastow, reading of the successful essays, music by a volunteer choir and by the children of the grammar school annex under the direction of Mr. N. H. Thompson, and awarding of the prizes by Mrs. E. B. Lund, president of W. C. T. U.

The essays were very creditable, both as to their matter and manner. MRS. E. M. WHEELER.

NEWS IN A NUTSHELL.

MISS JENNIE SMITH reports crowded meetings, and deep interest in the railroad meetings recently held in New York.

THE W. C. T. U. of New Laconia, W. T., are doing good work by scattering temperance leaflets, using among others "Shall we License the Dram Shop," just before the election.

THE annual convention of the Michigan W. C. T. U. will be held in Flint, June 3, 4, 5 and 6.

Miss Willard, Mrs. Hunt, with others of national reputation, will be in attendance.

A MOST interesting series of meetings has just closed at Fulton, Ill., led by Alexander Cooper. Three hundred signed the pledge despite the influence exerted from the Iowa side of the river.

AT Kirkwood, Ill., Mr. Cooper's labors were also greatly blessed. The interest aroused was so great that even the opera house would not hold the people. Many drinking men were reached.

THE W. C. T. U. of Cheyenne, Wyoming, holds a mass meeting every Thursday evening, going from church to church. They have also made arrangements to hold religious services in the jail every Sunday.

GRASS VALLEY, (Cal.,) W. C. T. U. has a flourishing temperance school. They have placed Dr. Richardson's text book on alcohol in the various public school libraries, and distribute juvenile temperance papers among the children.

MRS. S. A. MCCLEES has issued her circular letter to the state superintendents of the work among soldiers and sailors in such attractive form as to insure good heed and adoption for her plans, which are very simple and practical.

THE Woman's Christian Temperance union of Eugene, Oregon, is doing good work, carrying on a temperance school for the children, in which they have about two hundred, and working up the interest of the mothers as the lever which moves all the rest.

MRS. H. K. HINES, president of the W. C. T. U. of Oregon, writes, "Our work has been steadily progressing during the year, and there seems such a look of promise about it that all classes of society feel that we are here to stay." Oregon now has twenty unions.

MRS. ANNA BAIN, state president of Kentucky, organized a union at Williamstown in the "blue grass country," on the 10th inst., with thirty members. Our informant says, "The leading ladies of the community compose the union." Mrs. Rosa Frank was elected president, Miss Corine Wilson, secretary.

THE Waukegan Band of Hope has just begun a new year with a "full treasury" by having a literary and musical entertainment given by Miss Mae Dodson and Ida Ballou, of Chicago. The entertainment has been pronounced by all to be the finest of its kind ever given in Waukegan and the superintendent heartily recommend them to other unions.

REV. L. T. CHAMBERLAIN, and Rev. T. L. Cuyler discoursed of total abstinence in connection with the Sunday School Times lesson for last Sunday. The same paper printed an excellent editorial on the same topic. The latter takes the view that as a matter of imminent peril to themselves as well as to others, Christians should avoid the slightest use of intoxicants.

THE Bellefontaine, (Pa.) W. C. T. U., has since March organized three unions, one a very promising colored union, with a Band of Hope of the colored children. They are sending THE UNION SIGNAL to this colored union also to the Milesburg and Gap unions and to one of their own members not able to take it.

Other unions have full liberty to go and do likewise.

MRS. S. A. MCCLEES, national superintendent of temperance work among soldiers and sailors, sent her pretty "love letters," on valentine's day to each of the apprentices in the Naval service, on board the school ships with the sanction and hearty approval of Commodore Luce, chief of the squadron and also of the officers of the several ships, who rendered her valuable assistance in sending these missives. The officers write to her, "God bless you for remembering the boys." The recipients of the letters have, many of them answered with expressions of gratitude. A temperance organization has just been effected on board the flag ship, New Hampshire, stationed at Newport, R. I.

FLOWER MISSIONS.

This is my experience, for when my appointment came to me I questioned the utility of the work, and on that ground hesitated about accepting. I am thankful now those questionings have given place to "the evidence of things seen." Let me say also that experience teaches me that if "we take the attitude of service the service will surely come."

It seemed to me at that time that whatever might be done in other portions of my state (Indiana) nothing could be accomplished at my own home; but here the result of earnest thought and effort was an efficient and willing band, led by an invalid who for eight years had been shut out from active Christian work, but who brought a consecrated heart to the service, and whose weakness was the strongest appeal to those who loved and honored her. God has been pleased to call the gentle spirit higher where flowers are fadeless and the blooms eternal; but her "works do follow her," and with a new superintendent upon whom the mantle of this dear one we trust has fallen, we are planning for an active campaign this summer.

We begin with prison day, June 9, the birthday anniversary of our beloved National superintendent. The plan of work proposed for the coming year is as follows: After prison day, June 9, jail and station house, June 24; alms house, July 8; Orphan's Home, July 29; Widow's Home, August 19; for the sick in the various churches represented in the Band September 9. At each of these various places last year we held religious exercises, and distributed tracts, papers, books and testaments, and of course, flowers and scripture cards. At the alms house gave fans, fruits of various kinds and jellies. Everywhere we met the most eager interest and earnest attention, with cordial invitations from both officials and inmates to come again.

At each meeting extra bouquets and cards were provided for any sick among the poor of the city, and persons reporting such were instructed to deliver them.

Here is a question for our national superintendent: What method of raising funds would you suggest? Would it do to ask the benefit of an entertainment from our Y. W. C. T. U. and Bands of Hope? Our members have been paying a fee of twenty-five cents, but we do not find that adequate, and yet we do not feel like asking more nor of those who belong to the several branches of the union. (There are nine branches.)

One other question of our dear invalid. Would it be best to require those engaged in this work to become members of the union? At first I thought not but now I see that their connecting link to state and national is thus lost. One suggestion and I have done. Where there are Bands of Hope or young people's organizations or even individuals interested, why may they not go into the fields or woods and gather the flowers and send to the nearest organized band to distribute? A picnic lunch or dinner would make it a delight to the young people and it would relieve in many cases those already overburdened with work.

OFFICIAL COMMUNICATIONS.

WORK AMONG LUMBERMEN.

Dear Sisters of the W. C. T. U.:

The executive committee of the N. W. C. T. U. has taken up the work for lumbermen, a work of the utmost importance, not only for the lumber producing states, but for all the country.

Scores, nay hundreds, thousands of men removed by their occupation from ordinary gospel privileges and living in absolute disregard of the claims of their moral and spiritual nature cannot fail to create a poisoned atmosphere wherever they go. Returning from the camps to the cities and villages they become the patrons and supporters of hundreds of saloons and brothels, spending in a few days, sometimes in a few hours, the earnings of the winter. Here is a field of work which is almost without limit. For a long time the idea prevailed that the woodsmen could not be reached by gospel and temperance influences. However, through the brave efforts of Wm. F. Davis, the lumberman's missionary, large numbers have been blessed of the Lord in such signal ways that there is no longer the slightest excuse on the part of Christians for holding aloof from a work demanding their thoughtful attention. No instrumentality seems so well adapted to the work of destroying the fountain heads of the streams feeding multitudes of saloons as the Woman's Christian Temperance Union with its local, undenominational Christian basis. What we wish to do is, to preach not only temperance but Christ to lumbermen's employes and their associates. They must be sought out in the logging camp, on the drive, at the mills, in the salt blocks and in the cities and villages where they rendezvous. It is a work that must be done six days in the week and twelve months in the year. To accomplish this we must have missionaries and colporteurs to hold gospel services and to distribute good literature; and not only workers are required, but money is absolutely needed. In view of the fact that Mr. Davis, who originated the work among woodsmen, has the experience without which the work cannot be successful, it seems best to co-operate with him at present.

Mr. Davis has already missionaries in the field and is in a position to get more as soon as funds are provided; he also has missionary headquarters in East Saginaw, Mich. I therefore urgently request all unions, both state and local, of the eastern and middle states, as well as of Michigan, Minnesota and Wisconsin to assist me in this work by making engagements for Mr. Davis to address unions on this subject and also to take collections for the work which are to be credited to the W. C. T. U. and shall be placed in Mr. Davis' hands for the carrying on of this branch of our work. Mr. Davis is a man of the best culture which this country affords; he has studied the temperance question in all its bearings, physical, spiritual, social and political. Foregoing ease, the pleasures of refined society, the comforts of home, the security which a generous pastorate in an eastern city affords—all these he has relinquished for the Master's work, that the cause we love may be promoted in those sections far removed from all Christianizing influences; his addresses cannot fail to have the effect of the very best temperance lecture and gospel sermon. We must fight the liquor power at all points, and to this end we must attack where the business is made most profitable to the destruction of the bodies and souls of the sons of the nation. We are making mighty efforts in behalf of the soldiers, sailors and colored people of the south, but we must not forget that in some states the success of our cause is most intimately connected with the evangelizing of the woodsmen. To this new and inviting field we are now in the providence of God directly led. Let us go courageously forward, for as to the Israelite of old, the Lord now gives to His children all the land on which they have faith to put the soles of their feet.

Engagements can be made with Mrs. Emma Obenauer who has been associated with Mr. Davis in his work and is thoroughly conversant with his methods by addressing her at East Saginaw, Mich., where she has charge of the lumbermen's mission and where she is laboring with signal success. Mr. Davis may be secured by addressing him for the next six months as follows. Rev. W. F. Davis, Mt. Washington, Chelsea, Mass.

Signal Notes.

"Two intemperates self-slain," is the suggestive heading given in the Chicago Journal of the 31st. ult. to an account of two Germans who hanged themselves in Chicago that day because of degradation and wretchedness caused by indulgence in strong drink. And yet there are men who say it is wrong to shut up the saloons by prohibitory laws!

A WRITER to the Chicago Tribune, in speaking of the statement made by a member of congress, that whisky is a raw material, and therefore should not be taxed, speaks as follows: "Whisky a raw material! What do we manufacture from it but criminals and drunkards and paupers? Raw material! And where are the finished products stored? In the alms-houses, jails, penitentiaries and on the gallows!"

THERE is a young lad in this city who has a good place and attends faithfully to his duties. He had one bad habit and that was chewing tobacco, in which he indulged more freely than men who had chewed for fifty years. Last Saturday a gentleman offered the boy $5. if he would quit chewing for a year. Another followed suit, and a third, all signing their names to a paper agreeing to give the same sum. The boy said he would win the money, washed his mouth, and began right away. Sunday he felt badly, and Monday he was worse. Tuesday he shook and trembled like a man with delirium tremens, and yesterday he was confined to his bed, from which he has not got up, and it will take some time before the effects of the poison in his system can be worked out.—Hartford (Conn.) Times.

TO OUR READERS.

We append the testimony of Gen. C. H. Howard, because of the esteem and confidence in which he is held, not only by his many friends, but also by the thousands who know him as the recent editor of the Advance, and hence know that only deserved merit alone can influence him in the following statement:

CHICAGO, Ill., March 4, 1884.

DR. F. L. PEIRO—Dear Sir: It gives me great pleasure to state that Mrs. Howard's health is permanently restored. Last summer she began the use of your excellent Oxygen treatment by your advice So gratifying have been the results that it seems to be not less than a simple duty, as a debt of gratitude, to make this statement. Very respectfully yours,

C. H. HOWARD.

TEMPERANCE WORK IN GREAT BRITAIN.

Thomas H. Barker, secretary of the United Kingdom Alliance, is reported by the New York Tribune as saying: "We have been busy in England during the last thirty years extending temperance work. Our plans have been modeled largely after those in the United States, and we have had valuable aid from the leading temperance men in this country, such as Mr. Gough and the late Mr. Dodge. I do not suppose we have made the same progress you have here, but we have done a good deal. Our counties have not the privilege of self-government as in the United States, or we should to-day have local option in Scotland, Wales, and the northern counties of England. So much we have done. Sir Wilfred Lawson, president of the Alliance, obtained for local option a majority in the house of commons, and Mr. Gladstone has pledged himself that a bill shall be brought into the house dealing with the whole question. Formerly the members paid no attention to us, but now many are with us. Sir Wilfrid Lawson contributes £1,000 a year to temperance work, and many others contribute sums regularly from £100 to £500. The expenditure in Great Britain for intoxicating liquors has averaged during the last twelve years £136,000,000 a year; this is a decrease from the period preceding, a reduction partly due to the work of the alliance.

Miscellaneous Selections.

THE extraordinary peril to which a beer drinker is subject is evinced in the death of W. J. Flynn of Chicago, from a slight bruise, and now we find published the the following: "Men working about the English breweries drinking beer constantly dare not so much as scratch their hands on a nail, without fear of lock jaw, or strike their shins against a step, but the leg is in danger of amputation. Some large brewers east and west are total abstainers. All this speaks of poisoned blood."

A GREAT preacher in London was defending his wine drinking to me. I said, "suppose J. B. Gough were a poor inebriate in London, and were to be converted which church would it be better for him to join, yours where his taste would be recalled and he placed in danger, or Mr. Spurgeon's where you find total abstainers at communion table?" That argument touched him although he was invulnerable to every other. That is the argument we are to apply to every man or woman who would belong to the rescue section of religious society. JOSEPH COOK.

A GREAT meeting of Scotchmen was held in Edinburg. March 22, to ask for parliamentary suffrage in addition to the municipal suffrage which the women householders of Scotland already possess. The meeting crowded the largest hall in the city, that of the United Presbyterian Synod, and an overflow meeting was held in the Presbytery Hall. Mrs. Duncan M'Laren, a sister of John Bright, was among the speakers. On this occasion Mrs. Lindsay, wife of professor Lindsey of Glasgow, said:

We had an excellent meeting in Glasgow some time ago, at which Mrs. M'Laren presided. It was a wet evening in November, and in the large hall, capable of holding more than 3.000 people, there were many women with children in their arms, and many of the husbands kept house, that their wives might have an opportunity of attending the meeting. One result of the meeting in Glasgow has been that it has brought into our ranks a large number of Christian workers who are engaged in temperance work. They felt what a power for good there was in the woman's vote, and some of the most devoted workers for woman's suffrage have given their lives to temperance work; some of them have already used their municipal votes for the temperance cause. Everywhere, I think, the women's votes have been used for this cause because of the dreaful evils of intemperance. In Rothesay, where there is a large number of women householders, they have so exercised their votes for the temperance cause that no candidate for the town council has the slightest chance of success unless he is a temperance candidat .

The Union Signal

OFFICIAL ORGAN OF THE WOMAN'S NATIONAL CHRISTIAN TEMPERANCE UNION.

"Thou hast given a banner to them that fear Thee; that it may be displayed because of the Truth; that Thy beloved may be delivered."

VOL. X.—NO. 20. CHICAGO, MAY 15, 1884. $1 75 PER YEAR.

THE Friend's Temperance Association of Philadelphia, has secured the expulsion of all alcoholic liquors from Fairmount Park.

The New York Tribune is rapidly becoming a true temperance sheet. It will soon come out for prohibition if its future progress keeps pace with its past.

WHILE Mr. Francis Murphy is winning his thousands in Chicago, Mr. Edward Murphy, his son, is putting on blue ribbons by the hundred in lesser Illinois cities. They will unite their efforts in this city as soon as Mr. Murphy, Jr., can be spared from the interior.

THE high license law now in effect in Chicago will, it is thought by some public journals, notably the Daily News, reduce the number of saloons about one hundred and fifty. Already some 3,300 have taken out licenses and still the applications for more are made at the rate of twelve or fifteen daily.

THE Iowa brewers who claim the protection of, and compensation for their property because of their law abiding character, have at their recent state meeting come out squarely in rebellion to the new law and declare their firm determination "to fight it and its promoters to the bitter end." That sounds very much like a declaration of war.

ONE of the "straws."—The republicans of Kansas, Iowa, and Maine, our great prohibition states, have met, set, and dispersed. Iowa and Kansas make not the faintest allusion to prohibition in their platforms, while Maine has the courage to speak out for a state constitutional amendment, but not to recommend one for the nation.

IN Nassau, one of the largest Bahama communities, a local veto was placed on the saloons of a certain ward by the united vote of men and women. The legislature promptly came to the relief of the exiled saloonists, whereupon the inhabitants appealed to the crown, and to her eternal glory be it spoken that Queen Victoria promptly made the legislature of none effect where THE PEOPLE had spoken.

THE critics of the drama are telling us that the grand source of Henry Irving's perfection in tragedy is ceaseless rehearsal with his supports, even of plays he has rendered an hundred times. Cannot the workers for temperance who sometimes feel that success is slow, here catch a suggestion to keep up and multiply their rehearsals, waiting yet a little for perfection against the traffic that is tragedy even Irving can not counterfeit!

DURING the past week Francis Murphy has held meetings each afternoon and evening at Park Ave. M. E. church in this city. The church has been crowded nightly and up to Saturday evening 1,300 pledges had been taken. At least five hundred more were taken at the Sabbath afternoon and evening services. The present week Mr. Murphy, assisted by his son Thomas E. Murphy, is to be at the Fourth Baptist church, and it is expected that another week will witness a general rally in the central part of the city.

ONE of Iowa's river towns that has been congratulating itself on the availability—that is to say nearness—of Illinois' highly licensed saloons, woke the other morning to find that the river town opposite, and the two or three villages upon which it had counted, had suddenly in the prohibitory cyclone of this year's elections, "gone dry," and the supervisor of the township had declared that he would not grant a permit to any would-be saloon keeper within the limits of his jurisdiction. Illinois is not all "sold under sin."

NOTE the call to prayer by our national officers on page 12. Let every local union in the land be on its knees May 27, praying that God will assert His right to rule in the government of man. The national conventions of the republican and democratic parties organized as they are from the tributary caucus and convention upward for selfish rather than patriotic purposes, may nevertheless be swayed and bent by the breath of Divine will. Ask God to make bare His arm, and to unsheath His sword against the forces that threaten us.

ORANGE JUDD, the veteran agricultural editor, of the country has like many other good things gravitated to Chicago. He is now at the head of that time honored advocate of the people's, and especially farmer's rights, The Prairie Farmer. In a recent editorial, he advertises for an assistant who shall be qualified in many ways, but the final and test condition is, total abstinence. He says: "Finally, we can not engage a man who swallows alcohol in any form, even in beer, for alcohol affects the brain tissue and unfits the man for thinking accurately at all times. An editor, of all men, needs to be ready, on all occasions."

IN a recent conversazione given by the Scottish Temperance League in the city of Glasgow, the Rev. Professor Lindsay, D.D., of the University, discussed the question, "Women's Suffrage as Related to Temperance Work." His plea was a strong one for this new force in temperance reform, and gave the encouraging statement that in Rothesay, where the woman's municipal vote has been organized, the temperance women, the Bible women and the good women of the homes have so banded together that unless a candidate for municipal honors in Rothesay is a temperance man, he has no chance at the polls. The Rev. Alexander Wallace, D.D., followed Dr. Lindsay and seconded his argument strongly. Glasgow has 13,000 women voters, and it is proposed that their votes be organized for temperance.

A LITTLE prosecution is often an excellent thing and in more ways than one. Twelve students in Knox college, who engaged in bell ringing and other jubilation on the night of the recent triumph for their college in the inter-state oratorical contest, were put in durance vile by the whisky mayor of Galesburg for disorderly conduct. The evidence at the trial proved conclusively their innocence and it was discovered that the secret of the arrest was that these students worked hard for anti-license at election, and were thus punished for it by the mayor and his clique. But they overreached themselves. The trial was the grandest temperance lecture ever delivered in that city. In the examination the facts were brought out that most of the boys had never tasted liquor and that the policeman who arrested them was half drunk.

"FOR God and Home and Native Land" was never inscribed on a more fitting memorial than the beautiful gift of the W. C. T. U. to ex-Governor St. John. Gold and diamonds are perishable material beside the love and devotion which lives in the hearts of hundreds of mothers whose homes he works to protect and foster. A shield graven with appropriate devices, surmounted by a dove pendant from an arch, diamond-starred, and the W. C. T. U. monogram resting over all with cross and anchor intertwined, is the significant story told in gold and precious stones, by the W. C. T. U. of Kansas, to this valiant knight of prohibition. A beautiful letter accompanied this talismanic gift and called out an equally beautiful response. The W. C. T. U. of the nation may well say to that which has so honored itself in honoring its hero,

> Our hearts, our hopes, our prayers, our tears,
> Our faith triumphant o'er our fears,
> Are all with thee—are all with thee.

FOR DECORATION DAY.

BY MRS. MARTHA WINTERMUTE.

FOR GOD.

She had culled her white carnations
And pansies and rosies bright,
All dripping with dewy tear-drops
And gleaming in the light.

Then the bleeding heart and the lily,
She wreathed in the chaplet, and thought,
Of the hearts of our honored soldiers:
Of the costly peace they bought:

She thought of the hands so valiant
Close folded upon each breast:
Of the camp's lone Sabbath stillness
And the tent's long day of rest.

The crystal gates of the morning,
Broke wide o'er a world of bloom;
And she stood in a moment's vision,
Of that rapturous heavenly home.

Then in awe and delight her spirit
Pressed on, in the stillness of love;
As she whispered, "This day is God's day,
These moments drop down from above."

AND HOME.

Then she opened her soul as a garden,
That the sunlight, and beauty and bloom,
Might waken the hearts of her loved ones;
His spirit pervade and perfume.

Then the rosy lips of childhood,
And the lilies pure of love,
Bloomed in her earthly Eden,
With a fragrance born above.

No flowers so full of meaning
On that Decoration morn,
As the white thoughts of God's glory,
In the souls of her children born.

His angel with golden trumpet,
Seemed treading the buoyant air:
She whispered, "This home is God's home.
"This, a hallowed house of prayer.

AND NATIVE LAND.

Then the freshly clustering garlands,
And the fluttering flag on the breeze,
And the measured march of the veterans
Brought other thoughts than these:

She prayed as the people marshalled,
At the stirring beat of the drums,
For her Native Land beloved,
With its thousand, thousand homes.

Though a shadow swept their thresholds,
And a moment of trembling fear,
She whispered, "This land is God's land,
And His arm of might is near."

Then she gave her pure flowers praying,
All lands His mercy may share,
Till the white badge of "Our Union,"
The nations in triumph shall wear.

ALCOHOL A NARCOTIC ALWAYS.

BY DR JAMES EDMUNDS, SENIOR PHYSICIAN OF THE LONDON TEMPERANCE HOSPITAL.

The action of alcohol upon the life of man is a subject which must be of great interest to us all. It rais the greatest politico-economical questions which are now before us, for we spend enormous sums of money upon intoxicating beverages. It raises questions which to all Christian men are of the first order of duty, and it raises questions of conscience with parents as to whether they ought to teach their children to use those things out of which such grave evils come. We have before us three points—firstly, the nature of alcohol; secondly, the mechanism of the life we have to deal with; and thirdly, the action which alcohol has upon that life. Upon each of these topics we might talk for a week; but, fortunately, my task tonight is only to skeletonise each of them down into a ten minutes' conversation.

Now, what is alcohol? Alcohol is the inflammable spirit which is obtained by the fermentation and distillation of sugar. Of late years scientific men have extended the use of the term alcohol until it includes a very large series of chemical substances—substances which range in character from wood-spirit to solids like a wax candle. We gain nothing from the adoption of this extended definition, and therefore I shall adhere to that definition of alcohol which regards it as the inflammable spirit which is obtained by the fermentation and distillation of sugar. If we take the spirit thus obtained by the fermentation and distillation of various grains and fruits, we find that it contains some hundreds of volatile substances, almost all of which are alcohols, or derivatives therefrom. In our fermented and distilled liquors, we therefore, may have hundreds of alcohols. They vary very greatly among themselves, but we may limit our consideration this evening to the two alcohols which are the real factors in the action of intoxicating beverages. The first of these is what is called ethylic alcohol or the ordinary spirit of wine, and the second is known as fusil oil, which is chiefly amylic alcohol. Alcohol is always practically produced by the destruction of food. It is always produced by the fermentation of sugar or of some substance derived from vegetable life, and from which sugar is made by very simple changes. Starch, for instance, is merely an insoluble sugar stored up in the fabric of the plant. It is by the fermentation of these saccharine substances that we get alcohol, and as the ordinary sweet-wort or grape-juice loses its sweetness and its nutritious properties it acquires the intoxicating and poisonous properties which we find in our alcoholic beverages. Now it is this alcohol which is the real constituent of our alcoholic beverages. All other constituents can be more advantageously obtained from the unfermented food materials. There is no one of these alcoholic beverages which, if its alcohol were abstracted from it, would remain in use. Some of these contain alcohol which is almost entirely ethylic or vinic alcohol, some depend largely for their properties upon a heavier and oily form of alcohol, which is termed amylic, and which gives the coarse flavor to many forms of whisky. Amylic alcohol is undoubtedly more poisonous than ethylic, but time this evening will not allow of my going into that important subject.

What is the nature of life—I mean of the physical basis of life—with which I, as a physician, have here to deal? If you observe a child you see three things that are characteristic of its life. In the first place you see that the child has intelligence, and that it is attracted by any curious or novel object which comes within its range. When its intelligence is attracted then you see powers of motion in it, and that it has the power of carrying itself about, and of putting out its hand to seize the object, and of bringing the object into contact with itself. That is the second characteristic of life. Then, also, you observe that the body of the child is warm. Now, this intelligence is manifested through the machinery of the nervous system. The power of motion is manifested through the muscular system. The power of producing heat is needed to keep the body at that temperature at which it works most perfectly. This heat is produced by a slow combustion of materials in the blood which are partly the refuse produced by the action of the muscular and nervous tissues, and partly fresh food—partly materials which have not previously served other purposes in the body. When you come to analyze this wonderful nervous apparatus, which is the medium of our intelligence, you find that it is composed of distinct portions. There is, firstly, that portion which enables us to apprehend the things of the outer world. For instance, in the eyes we have a nervous apparatus which enables us to perceive the objects to which our eyes are directed. In the fingers we have a nervous apparatus which enables us to perceive the characters of the objects which we feel. In the ears we have an apparatus which enables us to perceive the characters of the vibrations which we call sound, and so, distributed over the surface of the body, we have a primary registering apparatus upon which the impressions of outward things are made. Then you have an internal nervous system, which registers, and, as it were, digests into a picture those impressions which are made upon various parts of the surface of the body. In that internal nervous machinery we have performed the the mental functions. Thirdly, you have a portion of the nervous system which you may call the executive, in which, after the judgment has been formed, the will acts, and in which finally the machinery is called into action in order to execute the behests of the will. Thus the action of the nervous system is determined firstly by apprehending things, then by thinking of them, and then by deciding what shall be done. But I must ask you for a moment further to consider that part of the central nervous system—the brain—upon which the man, as typified and characterized by the highest portions of his mental life, depends.

You ask what is the will-power, and how does it come about that the moment a man sees some object about to harm him, he raises his hand in order to defend himself? You say there is no thought there, because there is no time for thought. Yet there are many links of complex nervous mechanism, and were any one of these to fail, the dangerous object would not be seen, the arm would fail to protect, or the decision to act would be wanting. Taking the brain alone, we have in it an aggregation of nervous centres—a microcosm of the aggregation of minds which populate and determine the corporate life of a town. Each one of these brain centers has its own function and its own voice in the general government of an intelligent man, and it is their aggregate resultant which we regard as his will and his judgment, and the outcome of his mental life. Just as every member in the House of Commons, according to his mental power, shares in the action of the executive government, so does every one of these nerve centres go to form a sort of co-operative community within the brain, and to make up that mental life which determines the final character of the man.

In addition to this highly complex nervous system which I have so hurriedly outlined, you have subordinate systems which are vegetative, or more purely animal. But each of these systems, like a link in a chain, is essential to the continuity of the life of that nervous system and of that muscular system which together constitute the man. The immediate action of the brain or that muscle is determined, in the first place by the perfectly healthy character of the tissue itself, and in the second place by the quality and quantity of the blood with which it is supplied. The blood contains the material by which the tissue is fed, and it carries away the refuse which it has cast off. If those conditions be not present none of the functions of these tissues can go go on, and if the conditions are not continuously maintained then the continuity of their life ceases. Therefore the blood is the source of the power by which motion and intelligence are manifested. Then the blood is continually being driven through channels in the body similar to those canals by which an arid country is made fertile, and the blood thus passing through multitudes of extremely minute thin-walled canals is distributed with great rapidity through the body. By virtue of a mutual attraction, the tissues actually irrigate themselves with blood-fluid just as each particle of soil irrigates itself by absorbing the moisture which percolates through the surrounding soil. It is not in the canal itself, but in the moistened interstices of the surrounding soil, that vegetative life takes place; so it is upon the reactions between the molecular particles of the tissues and the extravascular soakage of the blood that intelligence and motion and the production of heat depend. We come now to the vascular system and to the heart—that muscular organ which is continually pumping the blood through the body. Upon this we again depend, just as our water supply depends upon the pumping engines which force the water up to the tops of our houses. If these pumping engines were to stop, the supply of water which flows into our cisterns would cease. Just so there is in the body a continual circulation of the blood. Appended to the circulation we have a series of side systems divisible into two orders; one replenishes the blood as fast as it is exhausted by the tissues, the other depurates or purifies the blood as fast as the living tissues cast refuse matter into it. The one is the digestive system, through which food materials are dissolved and absorbed into the blood; the other comprises a whole series of excretory systems, which get rid each one of a particular sort of refuse. If a man does not get an adequate supply of food, life comes to an end as soon as the supplies of material existing in the body are used up. Here death occurs by starvation.

If a man is submerged in water for sixty seconds he dies. Air has been stopped from getting into his lungs. The air which comes into the lungs with every inspiration supplies the blood with oxygen, while it carries off the oxydized carbon and other gaseous poisons which continually accumulate in the blood. The result is that every time we breathe—eighteen to twenty times a minute—we have air brought into the lungs and air blown out of the lungs, the latter being poisonous if breathed over again, and the first carrying into the blood one of those substances—oxygen—without which life can no more go on than a candle can burn. Now this is the respiratory system. This gets rid of the volatile or gaseous refuse. Then the kidneys get rid of all saline matters. All matters not volatile in their character are thus carried off in solution—rinsed, as it were, out of the body. So the skin, the liver, the lower intestine, and other organs, each has its own scavenging duty allotted to it. Thus we have a whole series of excretory organs continously acting to keep the body pure and to maintain those conditions upon which life depends from moment to moment. So much is this the case that, as I have already mentioned, if a man is submerged beneath the water for sixty seconds under ordinary circumstances life ceases, and the more he struggles the more rapidly he uses up what oxygen there is in his blood, and the fewer the moments before his life is extinguished. It is only when, by fainting or by injury to the head that life is as it were suspended, that anything like a more prolonged submersion can take place without the extinction of life. In the digestive system we have subordinate apparatuses by which food is selected, masticated and broken up—mixed with saliva in order that starch may be made soluble, mixed with gastric juice in order that flesh may be made soluble, mixed with a saponifying fluid in the intestine in order that fat may be made soluble; and the constituents one after the other absorbed in the blood.

This gives you some idea of our complex system and the way in which our functions are dependent upon each other. We now have some notion of that "life of man" upon which we are to consider the effects of alcohol. What is the action of this alcohol upon our life?

In the standard work upon organic chemistry by the late Professor Miller, of King's College, (page 427) I find the following definition of its properties: "Alcohol is a colorless, volatile, inflammable liquid, of spirituous odor and burning taste. Taken in small quantities in a diluted form it furnishes a useful and well known stimulant, and it forms the base of all fermented liquors; but in large quantities it produces intoxication, and acts as a powerful narcotic poison, frequently occasioning fatal results when taken in a concentrated state, and in excess."

In this definition we have four material points—first, that alcohol has a burning taste; second, that alcohol is a "stimulant"; third, that it is a narcotic poison; and, fourth, that when swallowed in a concentrated state alcohol frequently occasions fatal results. Now the "burning taste" is due to the fact that alcohol is a caustic, as will be felt by any one who may attempt to swallow a dessert spoonful of spirit of wine, which is alcohol diluted with a certain quantity of water. That alcohol is a caustic is the first fact which I ask you to note. The second fact is that alcohol, when diluted with water so as not to be caustic, if swallowed in large doses, produces death by narcosis. In this case alcohol may kill in a few minutes or in a few hours, and it kills by stopping the action of nerve tissue, and by paralyzing muscular fibre. The third fact is that smaller doses of diluted alcohol produce what is called by Professor Miller "intoxication"—intoxication being merely a Greek word for poisoning. Fourthly, it is said that this narcotic poison, which in large doses acts by stupefying and paralyzing, acts in small doses by stimulating. Now upon this fourth point I have for twenty years taken strenuous issue with the common notions as to the action of alcohol, and it is here that the strain of the question comes. Upon the first three points there is no room for difference of opinion. We will dismiss the caustic and the absolutely fatal action of alcohol, and devote our time to comparing the intoxicated condition with that condition in which the man is said to be stimulated. Perhaps we shall thus ascertain whether small doses differ in the nature of their effects from large doses, and, if so, in what way.

Brandy may be taken to be half alcohol and half water. If a man in full life take this spirit in a diluted form, you find that his intelligence, his power of motion, his capacity for producing heat are all lessened. That which is most speedily made manifest is its interference with intelligence. The nerve tissue is narcotized, and the man's intelligence fails him on all points; he can neither see nor hear with the same discrimination as before. He cannot think with the same cogency or accuracy. He has not the power of willing which he had before. The whole of the life-phenomena which are manifested through the nervous system are interfered with, and they are interfered with precisely according to the amount of the alcohol which has been taken. If a man weighing one hundred pounds, swallows one pound of brandy, the phenomena of life in him are limited to lying upon his back and snoring. This limitation will continue so long as his body contains one-half per cent. of its weight of alcohol. Supposing that the man takes one pound of pure alcohol adequately diluted, he takes 1 per cent. of alcohol, and that amount is always fatal. So much for the fact that alcohol is a narcotic poison. You will find that the alcohol also narcotizes the muscles, but it is so difficult to disentangle the phenomena resulting from narcosis of muscular fibre, which is the executive servant of nerve, from those due purely to the narcosis of nerve, which is the mover and director of muscle, that I must not occupy time by taking you into that interesting subject. I can only state that by this alcoholization of the blood the whole of the muscular system is interfered with in its vital activity precisely as is the nervous system. I may tell you that the only experiments which have really made clear the action of alcohol upon the animal system have been made within recent years by some learned French physicians at the cost of a personal friend of my own, a very eminent Swede, who upon another occasion put at the disposal of his own government the funds by which one of their Polar expeditions were sent out. At the expense of this patriotic Swede a very large number of very conducive experiments have been made. These experiments took place in Paris, and in some of them I took part. I am ashamed to tell you that some 800 dogs were sacrificed. Herds of swine have been fed upon all sorts of alcohol for years. Post-mortem examinations by scientific men have been made upon these dogs and swine, and the facts have all been recorded in accurate scientific form. It is out of these experiments that I give you this particular percentage with regard to the injection of alcohol into the body—that when ½ per cent. of its weight is injected, the animal always becomes comatose, and when 1 per cent. is injected, the animal always dies in a short time. Now, if instead of injecting so large a quantity of alcohol as that into the body, or if by diluting it enormously, so that it does not get absorbed into the blood so rapidly, you diminish the action of the alcohol upon the body, then you get minor effects. The question we are studying turns upon the nature of the effects which are produced by these minor doses. If you absorb alcohol amounting, say, to one-quarter per cent. of the body-weight, what is the nature of the phenomena you then see? Seasoned drinkers would be able to carry that amount; but those of us whose systems are unseared by continuous alcoholization would be in a state of intoxication until the alcohol had been got rid of. If you diminish the dose still more, then you have what is called an "after dinner condition"—a state produced by drinking three or four or five glasses of wine. There is redness of the face, considerable loss of power to hold the tongue, considerable forgetfulness of things which give rise to trouble and anxiety. Such persons do not walk perfectly straight. If you lead them to talk upon any difficult topic their ideas do not run perfectly clear. Their muscular powers are greatly lessened There is a lowering of the capacity for enduring cold, or for enduring prolonged fatigue; for using a rifle with effect in aiming at a mark, or for doing any other thing which tests the condition of the man. Persons alcoholized to this extent may talk more profusely, but they think less accurately. If you diminish the dose still more, the effects are more subdued; you have what is called "a well-known stimulant," to use Professor Miller's words.

We must now ask, what is a narcotic? and what is a stimulant? because we are in the face of two well defined yet contradictory attributions to alcohol.

Now what is a stimulant? A whip when applied to a horse is a stimulant. A stimulant is that which gets the strength out of a man without putting strength into him. A food is different from a stimulant. A food is that which supplies to a man's blood the materials which replenish his forces. A stimulant is that which draws out the forces of the body; a food is that which replenishes them. Now, in arguing about this, we must realize what we do with ourselves when we take "a stimulant"; i. e., that we are getting the strength out of ourselves, not replenishing our strength. Many people talk about "a stimulant" as if it were something which replenished a man's energies. It is no such thing, and if we are to have a clear thought upon this matter we must begin with clear conceptions of the facts with which we have to deal.

Now, what is a narcotic? A narcotic is that which arrests the vital activities of the tissues. A narcotic is the reverse of a stimulant. A stimulant evokes vital force; a narcotic is that which arrests the tissue—activities out of which vital forces come. Now, we are face to face with a curious allegation—that this strange substance (alcohol) which in large doses we know to be a narcotic—that is, a substance which prostrates a man, which in very large doses extinguishes his life, which in moderately large doses arrests all the higher functions of the man, so much that his life is limited by the capacity to lie upon a sofa and snore—that that thing in smaller doses undergoes a reversal in its properties, and becomes a stimulant. The proposition, mind you, is cardinal. It is fundamental to the position which we take when we say, "I find I get on a little better with a stimulant." It is fundamental to the position when I am standing by the bedside of a patient who is sinking from some exhausting disease, and I am asked to give him a stimulant. I have then to say to myself, "Is alcohol a thing which supplies my patient with energy, or is it a thing which merely whips the last remnants of energy out, and which causes a little flickering in the flame of life, only the more certainly to extinguish it?" That is the question. It is a big question for us all, and I do not know any question bigger for the clinical physician than this. Now this statement which I have purposely given you in the words of Professor Miller, is a proposition against which our intellects ought to rebel—the proposition that that which certainly is a narcotic in large doses is a stimulant in small doses. But now you will say to me, "You are criticising an established formula of our thought—what have you to give us in place of it?" That is a true touchstone for criticism. "It is easy to find fault, but criticism is easier than construction, and until you are prepared to give us some better theory, you have no business to find fault with what we have before us."

Well, now, I am prepared to submit to you a complete theorem, and it is this—that alcohol in small doses is a narcotic substance precisely as in large doses; and that the only difference in the action of alcohol when given in the dose of the ordinary glass of wine at dinner and in the large quantity of brandy which will extinguish life is, that the difference is not one of nature, but only one of quantity. That is the proposition which I put before you; and now I go back, in order to show you why I went into so much detail about the construction of the wonderful mechanism through which the life of a man is manifested. I told you that the brain, of whose functions mental action is the outcome, was a community of nervous centers. I now have to tell you that some of these nervous centers are merely perceptive or sensory.

Some, again, are volitional in the pure metaphysical sense of the term. Some of them are executive in that that they co-ordinate and animate groups of muscles which give effect to the action which is determined upon. Some others of them are regulative. The various centers, which inspire and regulate particular groups of muscles, have all to be co-ordinated in order to make up that entire action of the human body, which is exhibited in the movements and speech of a graceful man. And then, again, there are some other centers. There are those centers which are the last that the man acquires the use of, which are the last to be developed, and which are those that characterize all the highest attributes of men—they are the restraining or inhibitory centers in the brain.

There are men "who know the right and yet the wrong pursue,"—men who know what is right, but who have not the self-control to refuse to do what is wrong. These inhibitory centres, which are the very highest centers in the nervous fabric of man, co-ordinate and control a whole hierarchy of lower centers; and what I have to put before you is this—that the primary action of the alcohol is always upon these inhibitory centers, and that by paralyzing the restraining influence of these centers it emancipates inferior centers more or less from the control under which they usually act. In point of fact the action of alcohol in limited doses liberates an ill-regulated and wasteful activity, which is called "stimulation." Such "stimulation" in a man is like the heat and noise produced by the friction of a badly-adjusted steam-engine.

If I have succeeded in making this theorem clear you will be able to reconcile the apparently contradictory character of the phenomena called stimulation, and those recognized as stupefaction. Alcohol is always a narcotic whether the dose be large or small. But in small doses its action is expended primarily and chiefly upon those restraining and co-ordinating centers which are the highest in function, and the most delicate in structure. In small doses alcohol is a pseudo-stimulant, by which the influence of the highest brain centres is excluded from the life of man.

MRS. LEAVITT SPEAKS ONCE MORE.

DEAR UNION SIGNAL.—I am nearly in Miss Willard's condition about California notes; three months, and those full of work and not a word ready for the paper. So this morning of Feb. 1, waiting for a train due at 4:55, a. m., and which I now hear will not arrive till after nine, rails having spread and let one or two cars down between them, I make a beginning.

On the evening of Nov. 1, Dr. McDonald, so well known for the prizes he has offered in the schools, for essays on the subject of temperance as well as for the grand stand taken and held here these many years, opened his elegant new house to give me an opportunity to make the acquaintance of temperance friends. A crowd of people, repeated hand shakings, a kaleidescope of kindly faces, all beaming with good will, and giving promise that the good work already done in the state will be carried forward with increased vigor under the new impulse given by Miss Willard's visit. This was my reception. The next morning a few personalities stood out clear in my memory, and beside a sense of being at home in the strange young city, that would have come much later, but for this friendly social beginning.

The following two weeks were filled with work in the city, during which the leading churches were kindly opened and large audiences gathered to hear this vital question discussed.

To an eastern city dweller, San Francisco is less curious and interesting than the country, yet everyone must be amazed at its wonderful size, its fine substantial ware houses and business blocks, its elegant residences. It appears to me there is a greater variety of architectural style, not always the best, a greater profusion of ornament than I have seen in any other city. The cable street cars form a most notable peculiarity of the place. This is the most comfortable mode of street locomotion yet invented. The very steep slopes of the hills, sometimes more than forty five degrees, are prohibitory of horse power for heavy vehicles, but form no obstacle to this steam-driven unbreathing cable. The ferry boats which ply between the city and Oakland, with the waiting rooms at the landings are the finest on this continent.

* * * * * * *

Interruptions came at the above break, then such weariness while at work that everything possible was postponed, then illness, and I resume the story at this point, forced to make only hasty notes of the three and a half months of solid hard work in California. The quarterly convention held in Oakland in November, was a very useful, but not crowded or enthusiastic occasion. The union at Woodland, formed by Miss Willard in June, must be noticed as the most rapid in growth of any in the state, numbering over two hundred at my visit in December, and under its wise and energetic president, Mrs. Brownell, doing much excellent work.

A thanksgiving sociable, with work toward banishing wine at New Year's have been productive of much good socially.

The union at Chico formed by myself in December, with sixty members, Mrs. Gen. Bidwell, president, has not only increased in numbers, but has done much work. As one outcome of this movement, leading citizens determined upon electing a prohibitory city government at the last election, and did it. Gen. Bidwell, who long since uprooted his grape vines because he would not foster the wine traffic, has been a tower of strength all the way through.

The unions in Sacramento, under Mrs. Nusbaum, have much to contend with as the legislature meets there, and California, like so many other states of the union, continues to elect men to make its laws, who bring with them to the state capital, every session, a wave of drinking and debauchery. Gambling saloons are licensed in that city, which is an added cause of demoralization to to its youth. The W. C. T. U. have set up their banner, and will do their part to purify the larger outside home of their children.

The San Jose union, Mrs. Churchill, president, is one of the older unions and the largest and most influential in the state. The semi-annual convention in Feb., planned and prepared for by them, was a grand and enthusiastic gathering. Within a few days after its close, I was taken suddenly and violently ill, but expected, as did my physician, that I should be well again in a few days. But overtasked nature will have its revenge. The inaction of these few days revealed the true state of the case, and prostration ensued, the result of overwork through a long period of time, and from which I am not yet by any means recovered. When I live like an oyster, eating and sleeping only, I seem well, fit for anything, but as soon as I exert myself in anyway, head, heart and nerves fail, and I am not only unable to do, but suffer extremely. California has opened home and heart to me in a royal manner, and the kindness of the state board, especially during my sickness has my most grateful appreciation.

The temperance cause is in a hopeful condition. There is a way out, through the greater profit of raisin and table grape culture, from the bondage to the wine business, which has seemed an almost insuperable barrier to prohibition. The fallacy of the doctrine that a plentiful supply of pure wine will drive out other drinks, and also that it will promote temperance is proved from the fact that whisky is pre-eminently the saloon drink of California, and that in valleys where wine making has been long established gross drunkenness, and of entire families occurs, wine having been the only intoxicating beverage.

Many inquiries have been made of me in regard to climate. It seems to me to be a long, warm summer, a frostless autumn with some rain in the last weeks continuing into January. Up to that time, although there is a new green already starting, the autumn look predominates. Then spring sets in, coming on very gradually, not at a bound as in the New England states, and lasting through May. I have sat on piazzas, without wraps, and comfortably every month of the year, and I have also seen roses blooming in the open air, almost as far north as San Francisco every month in the year. The long rains, sometimes lasting a week or more at a time, are very trying to many people, and dangerous if there is not abundant fire in the houses. The lack of fire, of thick clothing, of adequately warmed churches and halls, explains according to my idea, much of the rheumatism and other ills from which the people suffer. I fell in love with the climate of California at once. Its scenery and its people have been constantly growing in my estimation. If governmental affairs are rightly administered, if moral and religious ideas advance as I believe they will, there is a wonderful future for this vast and wonderful commonwealth.

In the closing days of March I took steamer at San Francisco for Oregon. Neptune, heretofore my sworn friend and invigorator, not only failed to bless me, but was my enemy all the way up. Rain began to fall or rather we ran into the rain during the first day out. At the time of landing in Astoria, a queer little Venice, Oregon was maintaining her reputation as the place where "the rain, it raineth every day." The greater part of this place is built on piles, and the great Columbia, incomparably grander than the Mississippi or Missouri as I saw them, a great rushing inland sea, swept under churches, stores, dwellings and plank streets. It is said to be a very healthful place, and is certainly as agreeable to all the senses as any town I have visited. In spite of the rain a fine audience gathered and after about six hours' pause in the town, I went on board a river steamer, to proceed up stream at a very early hour in the morning. The morning was cloudy and showery. The far distant shore with its steep hills, forest clothed, were only half seen. The rain poured as I have seldom seen it, as we made the landing at St. Helens. Again an excellent audience for a place of its size in the midst of such rain and consequent mud. Here the temperance citizens were exerting every nerve to prevent the two saloons of the place from obtaining a renewal of license. The result under the local option law of this state depending upon which party obtains the largest number of signatures of legal voters.

The skies cleared during the night, and the steamer made a delightful passage to Portland, where I was kindly received by Mrs. H. K. Hines, president Oregon W. C. T. U. and conducted to the house of Mrs. —— Robb, to rest and prepare for another reception.

Very truly. MARY CLEMENT LEAVITT.

BLOOMINGTON AND HIGH LICENSE.

DEAR UNION SIGNAL:—While so many towns in Illinois are rejoicing in the triumph of prohibition Bloomington still stands in disgrace with its high license dram shops! The city has been under democratic rule for the past three years, but now there has been a great republican victory, and after the first of May there will be no more democratic whisky, but the city's partnership in the dram shops will be represented by a republican mayor and council. How was this victory achieved? This is presidential year, and the "country is to be saved." Both the republican and democratic parties here bow down before the liquor oligarchy. Both advocate high license, and neither party, when in power, makes any special effort at the "regulating" process. The results have been the same as where low license prevails. We have the same terrible catalogue of crime, poverty and death. Suicides have been frequent, while Bloomington has been held up before the world as an example of the beauties of "high license." Nevertheless, the complete failure to enforce the laws is undeniable, and this has been the great argument in the scramble for office this spring. Democratic liquor has been "so dreadful" that the republican Christians have rallied, and with the aid of Reibsame, the first president of the Illinois Liquor Dealers' Association, also late delegate to republican state convention at Peoria, they by their votes with other saloon keepers have decided that the city's partnership in the liquor business shall be presided over by a republican mayor and council. There were one hundred and thirty-eight prohibitionists here who could not be made to see any superior quality in republican beer and whisky, hence made their protest against both. The laws were not enforced under republican rule, neither have they been under the democratic administration. A republican mayor with his council went out to the fair ground once and welcomed the German Turnefest on Monday, when on the Sunday before there had been such a day of shameless carousal and drunkenness and Sabbath breaking there as is seldom seen anywhere. And a democratic mayor not to be outdone, welcomed the Liquor Dealers' Association here. While writing the above paragraph I have been interrupted by a call from a lady who wished to know if I "was the great temperance lady." (!) She had come for aid and sympathy for a poor distressed family, where the husband and father had attempted to commit suicide yesterday afternoon by cutting his throat. It was the old story of drunkenness, and a family of six needy children. Of course I was glad to give both aid and sympathy, but the thought came to me, why would there not be an appropriateness in searching out the thousands who voted to license these dram shops, instead of coming to one who protests against them?

I had just taken up my pencil again when a drunken young man went staggering by. Anybody can get all the liquor he wants in Bloomington, provided he has money to pay for it, and it produces the same effects as elsewhere. Possibly there may not be quite as many licensed saloons where the license is "high," but there are more unlicensed dram shops. Reibsame, who asks that his business "shall be made respectable," and who as yet sees no reason why he should desert the republican ranks, is a law breaker, as well as the democratic saloon keeper, who has not so high aspirations perhaps.

It is an astonishing combination when elders, deacons, Sunday school superintendents, saloon keepers and low grade politicians all vote the same ticket. We know what a saloon keeper's vote means, because it has been so often proclaimed abroad, but what can the other votes mean that nestle close beside it?

Oh, blessed consistency, indeed thou art a jewel!

MRS. G. H. READ.

OVER THE BORDER.

DEAR UNION SIGNAL:—Ontario's temperance work under the auspices of the W. C. T. U. has been enriched by a visit from your valued laborer and lecturer, Mrs. E. McLaughlin. She commenced in Cornwall, the principal city in Glengary county, and the most eastern city of the province where, though upon an evening when the rain fell in torrents, she spoke to a crowded house. In Minnburg, Prescott, Brockville Asylum (Que.), Ganamiqua and North Ottawa, there were full audiences to greet her. Here, at our Canadian headquarters, she addressed the Sunday afternoon meeting of the W. C. T. U. in the city hall, Mr. Alexander, of the civil service, in the chair. The hall was densely packed, and Mrs. McLaughlin actually pleaded for the honor of her Master's cause. Monday afternoon she met the ladies of the W. C. T. U. in their rooms, and gave a Bible reading, from Jehosaphat's prayer. Monday evening Victoria Hall was full; the platform was tastefully arranged, flowers and plants forming a pretty terrace. The chair was taken by Dr. Sweetland, sheriff of Carleton county; very hearty singing which the choir very happily commenced before the lecturer, Mrs. McLaughlin, arrived; she was greeted with song, and I thought it was a very happy idea. Sir Leonard Tilley, Rev. Mr. Armstrong, Mrs. Chisholm and Mrs. Tilton occupied seats on the platform. One of our kind friends in reporting the lecture says:

"A verbatim report alone could do justice to such a lecturer as Mrs. McLaughlin. Even that could not do her justice, or convey an adequate idea of her powers. Words alone in the printed column fail to produce the flashing eye, the clear ringing voice and the graceful and impressive gestures of such a polished and effective speaker as Mrs. McLaughlin. The lecturer gave an interesting account of the progress of the prohibitory movement in the United States, dwelling especially upon the marked decadence of drinking in the state of Maine under the difficulties and obstacles placed in the path of the lovers of strong drink by the prohibitory enactments of what is known as the 'Maine law.' The rise, progress and present prospects of the Women's Christian Temperance Union were then clearly and vividly sketched, and the success of the future hopefully and eloquently portrayed. Taken as a whole, the lecture was one of the most eloquent and forcible efforts on behalf of temperance that an Ottawa audience has ever listened to. The lecturer was frequently and loudly applauded.

"After the conclusion of the lecture the Hon. Sir Leonard Tilley in a speech of a few pointed sentences, descriptive chiefly of the progress of temperance in the Maritime Provinces, moved a vote of thanks to Mrs. McLaughlin, in which he characterized her address, as 'eloquent, comprehensive and exhaustive.'' The motion was seconded by Mr. Wm. P. Lett who spoke as follows: 'I wish to have the privilege of personally seconding the motion proposed by the Hon. Sir Leonard Tilley. If I remained silent you might imagine that the eloquence of Mrs. McLaughlin had deprived me of the use of speech. No one has suffered so much from intemperance as woman—no one has a better right to raise her voice against the cause than woman—and, I think, you will all agree with me, that no one can tell the pathetic and melancholy sting of humanity's wrongs with more eloquence and pathos than a woman. With exceedingly great pleasure I second the motion.'

We hoped to have her back for the 24th to address the meeting, held under the auspices of the Church of England temperance society, but the programme was too full, and other strangers had been invited from a distance, to give addresses.

We shall hope to have Mrs. McLaughlin with us again before many months. We are looking forward to having Mrs. Hunt next month, and nothing helps us more than visits of such profit as these from our American sisters.

OUR "FAITH CULTURE" DEPARTMENT AGAIN

DEAR UNION SIGNAL:—The peerless Frances Willard spoke to a crowded house in this place last night. She has spanned this nation with her indefatigable labors. The echoes of her silvery voice are heard from Maine to California. Her motto has become national, "For God, and home and native land." God bless the president of the W. C. T. U.! God bless Frances Willard.

For nearly two years I have been laid aside, not able to leave my room only as I was carried from one place to another seeking health. It seems very strange after an active life to be so helpless and weak, but I can truly say God has made my bed in all my sickness. I can not work in the cause I love so dearly, but I can pray and oh, how I pray for you active workers.

When I was a little girl and visited my grandfather, he always in his family prayer used this expression, 'Oh, Lord, spare useful lives," and I can but echo his prayer, Oh, Lord, spare useful lives. I have prayed for the workers, that God would spare their lives and give them strength. I do love the W. C. T. U. with its wonderful organization; its standing committees reaching every department of work; but I move that we have another standing committee whose work shall be to pray for the recovery of the sick. We believe that different members of the W. C. T. U. have different gifts, and we believe that some of the members of the W. C. T. U. have been healed by prayer. My idea is that the different women in the state that believe in healing by prayer be members of this committee and appoint a certain evening in the week that they may meet to pray for the sick, say Tuesday evening. Let the names be sent to the chairman of the committee and she notify the state committees and they their locals. This may be complicated yet I think in a short time we could make it run smoothly, or perhaps a better way would be to have half a column of our paper devoted to these requests and let them continually pray for the workers in the field that their strength may be renewed day by day, and that they may be kept from sickness and disaster, and that terrible scourge of Satan—vain glory and pride. I have been suffering many months and have not been healed and yet I believe God will hear the united prayers of his loved ones for the sick. I believe that it is not only a privilege to pray one for another but a command, and he has promised to heal us if we have faith, "casting all our care on him" and I believe the fervent prayer of the righteous availeth much. I request all my dear sisters to pray for me that God may forgive my sins and heal my body. I would love to hear from different ones what they think of such a committee, if it would not be in accordance to God's command.

I find in looking over my journal, these words recorded: April 29 I feel worried and fretted but in my morning lesson were these words, "Cast all your care upon Him for He careth for you." Oh, I can not, I can not, Lord, do give me wisdom and freedom from care. I believe it is distrust and nervous fretting that cause half the diseases of the earth. I would like to found a hospital where the only cure would be a plain diet and entire consecration to Christ. There should be singing and praising God, confessing our faults and casting all our care upon Jesus. The house should be bright and beautiful, full of flowers and music; every day let bright, happy people come and have a service of song and thanksgiving, making melody in their hearts. This is my idea for a hospital for chronic incurable diseases, my prayer that some philanthropic person may institute such a hospital under the auspices of the W. C. T. U.

God bless you, my dear sisters, I send love and greeting to all the sick ones. Yours for Christ and humanity,

MRS. W. W. DENNY.

THE prohibition convention of Massachusetts, met in Boston, May 7, and elected delegates to the national convention at Pittsburgh, and adopted resolutions which declare for the immediate suppression of the liquor traffic by constitutional and statutory measures, and against legalizing an acknowledged evil; that the right to vote is inherent in the individual, without regard to sex or race, subject to such regulations as shall apply to all alike; that "science and experience prove alcoholic preparations not only unnecessary, but terribly injurious as medicine," and that the license law is "a covenant with death and an agreement with hell."

THEY WON'T CARRY ME.

BY JENNIE L. ENO.

To his tumble-down house in Hardscrabble Lane
Jack Morgan came stumbling home through the rain;
His clothes hung in tatters, on his head was—his hair;
His shoes were old boots once thrown by as past wear.

He routed his wife, as, crouched on her knees,
She fanned the dull embers with still duller breeze,
While thoughts of past happiness crowded her mind,
When plenty was round them and Jack was so kind.

"Get up, wife," he cried. "Quick! fasten the door;
The temperance people are moving once more.
They may 'carry the town,' but one thing you'll see:
Though they carry the nation, they won't carry me."

Then, doors barricaded and windows nailed down,
He tumbled to bed defying the town;
What harm could the innocent drunkard betide
In his home with the temperance people outside?

But as the day on the hills is beginning to break
He finds he has made a most stupid mistake;
No stronger teetotalers dwell in the land
Than they who surround him on every hand.

One look through his home compels him to think
Of comfort destroyed by the demon of drink;
The children crowd round him with pledge and with pen
And ask for his name there again and again.

And then little Katie climbed up on his knee
With her pretty new paper for papa to see,
And asked for his name close up at the top;
For she knew if she had it their troubles would stop.

He cried, "'Tis too much. What a fool I have been
To fasten my enemies not out, but in!
A man couldn't stand you though firm as a wall;
Hand over your pledges and I'll sign them all.

"The temperance people I've fought with my might,
Yet knew all the time that their way was but right.
Fling the windows wide open, pull the door fastenings down,
For they have carried me, if they haven't the town."

WHAT CAME TO DILLY'S HOUSE.

BY KATE W. HAMILTON.

Dilly was perched on a fence post, her light hair flying about her face, as usual, and her little red hands clasped behind her back. The three or four small toes that peeped out of the ragged shoes, were red also, for the autumn day was cold, but Dilly was used to such trifles. Toddles, the baby, who could not climb the fence, contented himself with looking through. He was bundled up—in a fashion of Dilly's own invention—in an old shawl. If the round face that peered between the fence rails was roughened by the chill wind, he, like Dilly, had grown accustomed to such discomforts.

It occurred to Freddy Burr, in the next yard, however, that their situation was scarcely agreeable. He looked up from the stick he was trying to cut with the hatchet, and said: "What makes you sit up there on such a day as this? Why don't you go into the house and keep warm?"

"'Cause I'd rather stay here and watch you, 'taint no fun in the house," said Dilly.

"Well, I wouldn't think it was any fun out here, I tell you, if I didn't have a warm coat and scarf, and these thick boots," remarked Freddy, displaying a pair of red tops that were his pride.

Dilly looked at them, and an old, vague wonder awoke as she did so, and grew more and more distinct, until it presently took shape in these words:

"Why don't I have such nice things, and something to wear on my head?"

"'Cause your father drinks 'em up," promptly answered Freddie, without the slightest hesitation in disclosing the truth.

Dilly pondered a moment and as promptly denied it.

"No he don't either, folks can't drink such things. Where do you get yours?"

"My father buys them for me: and the reason your's don't get them for you is 'cause they all go into old Barney's rum barrels, down at the corner. That's the way of it, true as you live, Dilly Keene, and its awful mean, too." declared Freddy, growing indignant as he explained.

Then a voice from the pretty house beyond called Freddy, and he ran in, while Dilly and Toddles, with their amusement of watching ended, turned away.

Dilly surveyed herself and the baby thoughtfully, then sat down on the log to meditate.

If what Freddy Burr told her was true, something must be done.

And the longer she pondered, the more fully she became convined that she had heard the truth.

"'Cause other folks has things and we don't, and what must be ours goes somewhere else," she reasoned, "they can't be any good there, either. I'm just sure they can't. Maybe I've got a hood—maybe it will be a nice red one, pretty and warm. Wish I had it now. Wish Toddles had—"

She stopped as a brilliant plan flashed suddenly through her mind. Wouldn't her mother be surprised if she could do that—poor mother, who was out washing, and who would be so tired when she came home tonight.

"Toddles, let's do it," she said, springing up excitedly. "Let's go and see if we can get some of 'em."

"Yah!" said Toddles, contentedly, and taking his hand she opened the creaking gate, and led the way into the street.

There was a number of men in the store at the corner — a queer store with a curtain across the lower half of the front windows. Dilly saw them when the door opened, but she was a determined little body, when once she had decided on the proper thing to do. So she only clasped Toddles' hand tighter and walked in and up to the counter, making an extra effort to speak distinctly, because her heart beat so fast.

"Please sir, have you got anything of ours a soak here?"

There was an instant's silence, then a shout of laughter.

"Well, now that's a neat way of putting it. Hey, Keene, these youngsters of yours wants to know if Barney has you in soak, here?"

An old slouched hat behind the stove was raised a little, but there was no other sign that the man heard. Dilly shrank back.

"Oh, I didn't mean him!"

"What did you mean, then?" asked a coarse, red-faced man advancing from behind the bar, and speaking in tones not at all gentle or amiable.

"Shoes and coats, and such things," faltered Dilly.

"Hoods—I'm afraid it is spoiled with whisky, but maybe ma could wash it out. Wouldn't you take some out of your barrel, Mr. Barney? We need 'em awfully bad."

"What barrel? who sent you here?" he demanded.

"Your rum barrel," answered Dilly, standing her ground desperately, though with a little catch in her voice, that was ready to break into a sob. "Ma works all the time, and she looks so sorry, and we don't have any nice dinners at our house, like at Freddy Burr's, and no shoes and clothes nor anything. I asked Freddy where our good things went to, 'cause they don't come to our house, and he said you had them down here in your barrels. Please do take some of 'em out Mr. Barney. I'm sure it can't make anybody's drink better to have a little boy's and girl's new shoes and dresses and everything in the barrel."

"You are right there, Sissy, it's nigh about spoiled the taste of mine," said one of the group at the counter, putting down his glass with a queer, perplexed look.

But there was no perplexity in the bar-keeper's look. That was wrathful.

"We've had enough of this nonsense! Now you leave, you young ragamuffins, as fast as your feet will carry you, and never let me catch you inside these walls again."

He stepped toward them as if to drive them out, but the man behind the stove suddenly arose.

"Take care, Barney, you'd better not touch them, you've knocked me about often enough, but you'd best leave them alone."

There was a fire in the eyes under the slouched hat, before which Mr. Barney drew back.

Both children were crying by that time, but the father took a hand of each.

"Come Dilly, come baby," and without a look at his companions, he passed out.

It was a very silent walk.

Toodles' eyes dried as soon as the stranger, whose loud voice had wakened his infant terror, was out of sight.

But poor little Dilly's heart was sore with disappointment and fear. She had failed in the scheme she had thought promised so fairly. No hood nor shoes after all her bravery in venturing into that dreadful store; and who could tell how mad her father might be.

She stole sly glances up at him from under the old hat, but she only saw a sober, downcast face, and he said nothing, not even when they reached home.

He hunted up some fuel and made a better fire; then he sat down before it, with his head between his hands and left the children to their own devices.

But two weeks later Dilly confidently said to Freddy: "See here," she said, pushing the toes of a new pair of stout shoes through the fence.

"And see here!" continued Dilly bobbing up for an instant to show the head gear that covered her yellow hair, and touching it significantly with her finger.

"Where did you get 'em," repeated Freddy.

"My pa worked and got 'em, and brought 'em home; and they didn't get into nobody's barrel," explained Dilly with great pride and little regard for grammar.

Then she pressed her head against the fence for a prolonged interview.

"You see the billenium has come to our house."

"The what?" questioned the bewildered Freddy.

"The billenium," said Dilly complacently, "but it means good times. Anyhow that's what ma calls it, and I guess she knows; it was just this way, Freddy Burr: When you told me Mr. Barney had all our nice things down at his store in a barrel, I just went down there and asked him for 'em—me and Toddles."

"You didn't!" exclaimed the horrified Freddy.

"Did too," declared Dilly, with an emphatic nod of her head. "Well, he wouldn't give me one of 'em, and was just as cross as anything. So then my papa got up from the stove and walked home with us. He didn't scold but just sat down before the fire this way, and thinked and thinked. At last he put his hand in his pocket, there was nothing there; then he put it in the other, and found ten cents, and he went and bought some meat for supper. Then when ma come home he talked to her, and they both cried. I don't know what for, unless it was 'cause we couldn't get the things out of the old barrel. And ma hugged and kissed me most to death that night, she did. Well my pa got some work the next day, and brought home some money; and now he has found a place to work every day. He bought all these things, and says his little boy and girl shall have things like other folks. So now you'll know what billenium means, when anybody asks you, and you can tell them Dilly Keene 'splained it to you."—Independent.

CAPTAIN DEBORAH'S TALK.

DEAR CHILDREN OF THE PREVENTION ARMY:—It is a long time since we have had a real talk together, but you have had good words from so many wise people that you have not missed me as I have missed you. I have been waiting rather impatiently for a chance to tell you of the way one Band of Hope responded to my call for help for the little folks of the Bethesda Mission. It was the Band of Marshall, a town in Illinois. These dear little people made up a box of clothing for the poor little street waifs that come to this Sunday school and children's church down in the Black Hole of Chicago, and when it was unpacked at the mission room you may well guess there was an outcry of delight as so many nice things were brought out one by one, and the little folks realized that they were all for them. Then there was a nice little letter, written by the secretary, Miss May Wallace, and it told the story of this loving work of the children for the children. It is the first box, so far, that has come in answer to my appeal, but I feel sure that more are on the way. And if there are I want to whisper a suggestion. The ladies of the Mission have now rented some rooms overhead, and are going to have a Creche, or Cradle Mission up stairs, a place where hard working mothers can leave their babies and "wee ones" as they go to their work, paying ten cents a day for their care and food and attention. Now don't you think it would be nice to put a few playthings into the boxes you are planning, and some bib aprons and anything your mothers may have left from your babyhood in the home nurseries? Again I want to thank May Wallace and the Marshall Band of Hope, and to beg you all to go and do likewise.

Now here is a "cute" little letter from a Band of Hope girl in Louisville, Ky. She writes a beautiful hand and I am sorry that you can't see her clear penmanship. She write to the great major general of our army and says:

In my last letter to Mrs. Foster I told her I was going to have my picture taken and promised to send her one, and if I sent her one how could I leave you out? Mother has been very sick but is better now.

There is not much I can do for our union but take notes for mother and save any money given me for the collector's card.

When I get eight dollars we are to have stomach charts for our headquarters.

We are all thinking how nice it will be to have you in June. I never have gotten your picture, but am waiting for it. Give my love to Mrs. Willard and Miss Anna.

I am your loving little worker, CARRIE A. LEECH.

Friday, April 4.

P. S.—Love from all my dollies, for you know they have all signed the pledge.

Some day I hope she will write to me, and you shall have that letter too. CAPTAIN DEBORAH.

We shape ourselves the joy or fear
Of which the coming life is made,
And fill our future's atmosphere
With sunshine or with shade.

THE SIGN BOARD

[A W. C. T. U. visitor at the national capital took "sweet counsel" ss with the earnest workers of the W. C. T. U. in that city, finding them engaged in especial effort among the veteran soldiers, one hundred and fifty of whom have been led to Christ by these efforts. At one of these meetings a young man who had resisted all the entreaties of friends and of the Spirit was led by the recitation of the following poem by a little girl at a temperance meeting, to sober, repentant thought and action, and so to a Christian life. The poem has been published before in this paper, but will have new interest from this circumstance.]

I will paint you a sign rum seller
And hang it over your door;
A truer and better sign board,
Than ever you saw before.
I will paint with the skill of a master.
And many shall pause to see,
This wonderful piece of painting
So like the reality.

I will paint yourself rum seller
As you wait for the fair young boy,
Dressed in the morning of manhood,
A mother's pride and joy.
He has no thought of stopping
But you greet him with a smile,
And you seem so blithe and friendly,
That he pauses to chat awhile.

I will paint you a sign rum seller,
I will paint you as you stand;
With a foaming glass of liquor
Extended in your hand;
He wavers but you urge him;
Drink, pledge me just this once—
And he takes the glass and drains it,
And the hellish work is done.

And next I will paint a drunkard,
Only a year has flown,
And into that loathsome creature,
The fair young boy has grown.
The work was sure and rapid,
And I'll paint him as he lies,
In a torpid drunken slumber,
Under the wintry sky.

I will paint the form of another,
As she kneels at her darling's side,
Her beautiful boy that was dearer,
Than all the world beside.
I will paint the shape of a coffin,
Labeled with one word, Lost!
I will paint all this, rum seller,
And will paint it free of cost.

The sin and the shame and the sorrow,
The crime and the want and the woe,
That is born there in your workshop,
No hand can paint, you know;
But I'll paint you a sign, rum seller,
And many shall pause to view
This wonderful swinging sign board
So terribly, fearfully true.

THE F. I. T. F.

BY ZELOTA MATHER GARNER.

"Young Raymond is their leader for good or ill," as his thoughtless impulsive generous nature leads him; but there is a mine of wealth in such natures, tho' sometimes it is necessary to quarry deep to find it. He gave me renewed assurance tonight, that he will squander no more money and manhood in rum and tobacco. It will be a hard struggle for the poor boy when he sees the tempting draught upon his mother's side board and be obliged to refuse it perhaps when offered him by the maternal hand which should indeed shield him from temptation."

His soliloquy is interrupted by a rap at his study door which he opens to receive young Raymond. The boy comes into the presence of his teacher with a respectful bearing unusual to him, and which would have reassured the hearts of those desparing ones who felt that there was no redeeming trait in the dreadful boys of H.

"A letter from my father, sir, I hope he has no complaint in it against me.

"I came also to invite you to be one of a party of friends who are to spend Christmas with us. Our parents are in the habit of allowing us permission each to invite one friend whomever he thinks most of. I much prefer you, sir, to any one else."

"Thanks, my boy, if it is possible I—"

"I trust it will be quite possible," interrupted young Raymond. "I beg you to consider, sir, before you refuse."

"Very well, if an answer at another time will do, I will consider."

"I will sir; thanks! And now if you will excuse me, I will leave you to read my father's letter," and the boy bowed himself out with a grace which would have gladdened the anxious hearts of his mother and sister. The letter ran thus:

DEAR SIR:—I take this opportunity to express to you my thanks for the interest you have taken in my wayward, impulsive son Richard. There has been a change in him since you became his teacher. For two years I have been very anxious about him, not knowing what course to pursue with him; but not until last night did I know how near the brink of ruin my poor boy has been. Then he came to me stricken with remorse, and told me he had taken money from my cash drawer, his monthly allowance not being sufficient to meet the needs of himself and associates in drink and tobacco.

Three months ago this leakage was discovered to be considerable. We traced it, as we supposed to one of my clerks, and I felt obliged to discharge him, though for the sake of his widowed mother I had not the heart to bring him to legal justice. I am speaking very freely to a stranger, sir, but my heart is almost broken. Richard assures me that he is to begin a new life from this time forth, that this resolve and his confession has been brought about through your influence. But I fear his struggle against appetite will be very hard for my poor boy. His mother and myself have been reading the little pamphlet upon "The Nature and Effect of Alcohol" which you gave Richard. O, how blind we have been all these years. We did not know, that was all. Every body almost thinks a little alcohol is good. I have always advocated moderation, honestly believing that there was no need of excess, that any person could use self control if they would, but I am satisfied that the "alcohol habit" as it is named in the pamphlet has got a firm hold upon my poor boy. Will he be able to conquor himself? His mother and I are resolved upon removing every temptation in our power from him. He will see no more choice liquor upon our sideboard, I assure you. I most earnestly desire you to be near him during his coming weeks of trial. Will you come and spend your vacation at my house? Mrs. Raymond joins me in the request. I am told you are an earnest student. My library shall be at your service, and my back parlor at the disposal of the F. I. T. F., the significance of which we are puzzling our brains to make out.

I have been very stupid, sir, all these years not to take an interest in those having the moral and intellectual training of my children. Like many others I troubled myself very little about the matter. I have thought that the responsibility rested with the state, and that when my taxes were paid my responsibility ended. I think differently, sir, tonight. I consider that you are one of my employes and that it is as much my duty to look after the results of your work, as that of my bookkeeper or the man who counts my cash.

I have opposed the combining of moral with intellectual training. The experience of the last few days has shown me my mistake, and how admirably they go together. You are intrusted with my dearest interests. It has been my habit for years to bestow upon my faithful employes at Christmas time some little token as evidence of my commendation. How can I but be grateful for your work. Enclosed please find a meager expression of my gratitude, in this order, which will be honored upon presentation at Freeman's Clothing Emporium, 169 Hagan St. Cash or trade as you may desire.

Don't thank me sir, I am yet immensely under obligations to you. Let me see you at your earliest convenience, and oblige,

Yours truly,
RICHARD RAYMOND."

For a moment Chas. Pulsifer blushed like a girl, with wounded pride.

The Sunday School Lesson.

May 25.] Third Quarter, No. VIII. [1884.

TOPIC: LIBERAL GIVING.

LESSON TEXT.—II Cor. 9: 1-15.

GOLDEN TEXT.—God loveth a cheerful giver.—II Cor. 9: 7.

TIME.—A. D. 57.

PLACE.—Macedonia.

1. Christianity is the foster mother of "ministering to the saints". History gives us no note of one nation ministering to another or of alms giving on any broad national plan, previous to the establishment of the Christian church. The missionary apostle was a great believer in the culture of giving and perhaps as much for this reason as for the actual need of the "saints" encouraged and exhorted to liberality. He doubtless expects the exercise of this liberality in hearty accord, to heal over the dissensions that he so greatly mourned in the Corinthian church. Nothing so promotes harmony as a union of self sacrifice.

2. To Paul's thought there is no joy or blessedness in grudging giving. In fact a gift with a grudge behind it is no gift at all, it is nothing but a tax, levied by some real or fancied authority. A gift is the bud and blossom of love.

One of our good Christian laymen in Chicago insists that there is owing and giving—that one-tenth of all we earn belongs to God. When we give only one-tenth of our income we are only paying our debts; when we exceed that, we begin to give. It is well worth considering, this matter of tithing for debt, the Lord being a preferred creditor, and of exceeding our tithes in actual gifts.

3. The heart is the seat of benevolence. As one purposeth in his heart of love, so let him give. How is this? Does love ever grudge its service? Does love stint its beneficence? If love be the inspirer and governor of purpose how will our gifts be doubled, trebled and quadrupled! Again the heart of love is reinforced by intelligent purpose. Love unguided might give unduly, unworthily and indiscriminately. It is the wise purpose of the heart that Paul insists upon as the authority in giving.

4. The Christian layman already referred to has also arrived at very legitimate conclusions concerning the ability and purpose of God to make "all grace abound" to the systematic cheerful giver. He has sent out hundreds of thousands of circular letters to Christian givers, asking for facts in answer to two questions: Have you any experience in tithing your income and if so have you been financially prospered? Have you any knowledge of any person who has adopted this plan and not been financially prospered?

To these letters he has received thousands of replies, and only in two instances has the word been that financial prosperity has not followed systematic giving and tithing.

5. A new and not often quoted reason for giving is this: That by our gifts we shall cause thanksgiving to abound. If we would have the air filled with praise to God, let us give with ungrudging hand. If you yourself desire the prayers of saints, give according to a rich purpose of heart, and if you have no "power of giving" the "terrible heart thrill" goes quivering along the lines of heavenly blessing till the same end is reached.

THE LESSONS OF ONE DAY OF PRAYER.

Four years ago in this city one might have seen, a few weeks prior to the National Republican Convention, men driven like sheep in crockery crates on wheels, to the primary meetings whence delegates were sent to the county conventions, these nominating delegates to the state, and the state in its turn to the National Convention. They were a shouting and howling procession as wagon after wagon passed loaded with this inflammable material, made even more dangerous to public welfare by plentiful supplies of raw whisky. A few weeks later the writer endeavored to reach her office in the Farwell Hall building through a crowd of boisterous, jostling, half crazy men who were "bolting" from the county convention, held in Farwell Hall. They too were shouting and howling; they were perhaps a little less idiotic in appearance and behavior than the men of the crockery crates, but they were the product of the deeds of that same drunken crowd driven to the caucus polls in the interest of a faction, or a man.

A few weeks later and the more refined product of just such scenes was in national assembly in the Exposition Building on the lake front, making a president of the United States. As this body deliberated the Woman's Christian Temperance Union were gathered together also. For what? That God would take in hand this National Convention and manage it according to His own plan and purpose. Hour by hour of the long summer day was spent in earnest pleading to this end. A certain leader to whom one of these hours had been assigned began in the early morning to search her Bible for the lesson of the hour. She remembered the men of the crockery crates—drunken, sodden humanity driven to the exercise of freemen's rights by a slave master as inexorable and as regardless of God and heaven as ever Egyptian bondage knew. She recalled the scenes of drunken, unmanly, unpatriotic action in Farwell Hall, and regarding the great gathering on the lake shore as the natural and legitimate outcome of these preliminaries, she said to herself, "Can any good thing come out of this Nazareth?" Her failing faith and fainting heart took refuge in the Word of God, and she asked that some lesson might be given her showing that God does indeed overrule if His children will not let Him rule.

Strangely, and yet not strangely if God answers prayer, her thoughts and attention were directed to the history of Israel's first king. In that first kingdom set up by the Divine Ruler, He was rejected. The people cried for a man to rule over them, and though contrary to His will and plan, God gave them a man for a king. This formed the lesson of the hour which had been assigned to her—showing how even against His own purpose for good, God yet overruled the rebellion of His chosen ones so that one was given them "head and shoulders above his brethren;" showing the care our Father exercises over even our wrong choosing and wrong doing. Her heart was comforted; she believed that though much had been done in evil and sin toward the making of our American king, God Himself would interpose His providence and secure the best results possible in view of all the preliminary wrong doing.

Out of that convention came Garfield—a man not perfect, not perhaps God's own ruler, but His instrument for overruling. It is then wise and right to pray. It is not a waste of effort and of spiritual force.

This is the first lesson that was taught in that fateful week. One other no less clear and pressing reaches back and lays over upon human responsibility, saying, "This ought ye to have done, but not to leave the other undone."

That crockery crate procession of political sacrifice ought never to have been possible in a Christian government. That howling mob calling itself by an honorable political name must be a blot on any Christian or patriotic organization for national ends. If you would have God rule right action and not be forced to over rule bad action in political affairs, begin at the beginning. Begin at the unit of political power, the individual voter. Begin at the unit of government—the primary meeting. Let the yoke of Christian obligation rest equally on both shoulders, in all that pertains to national life. Let men and women work as well as pray, and God shall be King.

---

Inquiries come to us almost every day for Band of Hope lessons. We reply giving the names of such as are already published. Still the demand comes unsatisfied. Now good friends, we certainly believe that if you will state clearly and fully just the sort of a lesson system you desire, the demand will be met, and in order to a frank statement of the need we ask the following questions:

Do you desire a series of lessons for the scholar's, or for teacher's use only?

Do you want these lessons in monthly, quarterly or yearly installments?

Do you prefer them in the shape of catechism or more after the fashion of the Sunday School Lesson Leaves?

Do you want them for primary or advanced teaching, or both?

We shall be very glad to get replies on all these points and that speedily.

CONCERNING the Rhode Island victory, Mrs. J. K. Barney, president of the W. C. T. U. of the state and inspiring leader of the workers to this triumph, writes:

Our bill was modeled after the New Hampshire law because of the expressed preference of some interested. We had already placed in nearly every school in the state, temperance text books and they were very generally used. So you see the way is prepared for good work. No time being specified, the law goes into effect on the rising of this legislature (within two weeks). We feel jubilant over the gain in Rhode Island this year. Our constitutional amendment petitions have met with such favor as to warrant our expectation of further favorable action by our next legislature, which in personnel will be an improvement on the last. We have a fight before us to prepare the people for action on constitutional amendment, but the work looks less formidable now, as the young men of the city have organized for earnest work and are in consultation with us as to methods, etc. Just as soon as practicable we will take up the "voter's pledge" and push the matter through the state.

FROM that pathetic little white couch at Louisville, where lies the imprisoned saint, Miss Jennie Casseday, our superintendent of Flower Missions, have gone out within the last ten days 3,000 leaflets of texts to be used on Prison Day, which falls this year on June 9, Miss Casseday's birthday. These have been unavoidably delayed greatly to her regret, but by this time these leaflets should be in the possession of every state superintendent, and Miss Casseday desires that this leaflet be used in every prison visitation, thus giving the same collection of texts to every prisoner in the land, and that after reading, the leaflet may be left in the prison, jail, or station, as the case may be, as a constant reminder of the love that seeks to make the prison doors of sin-stained hearts swing wide open to God's grace and saving power.

STRANGE to say, the brandy king of Sweden, ardent reformer that he is, is not yet for total abstinence, but is pushing on the European market pure spirits, in the hope of reform. And "now comes one" Charington, a great brewer of London who brews by day and holds temperance meetings by night, making most strenuous exertions to lock out even his own beer from a great London music hall. In Mile End Road, not far from his brewery, he has built a large tabernacle, which is open every night in the week for religious services, and here, frequently, when the day's work is done, this totally abstaining brewer himself holds the platform for a total abstinence sermon or lecture, and still more frequently conducts a rousing gospel meeting. England has need to establish standards of temperance.

THERE is one party in this country that is not afraid to pin its heart upon its platform and inscribe thereon, "Prohibition!" And yet it is a party fools have ceased to stigmatize as fanatics; this is the party of the Methodist Episcopal church. Its general conference now in session at Philadelphia plainly says, "Prohibition first, party afterwards!" That is, Christianity first, loaves and fishes later. The 1,800,000 members of this church are not a bad nucleus for a hammer against the jug. And there are many more like them. There are more prayers in ballots than there used to be.

ONE entire session of the Triennial International Sunday School Convention which meets in Louisville next month, has been secured for the W. C. T. U. temperance meeting. This has been done at the earnest solicitation of our superintendent of Sunday School Work, Miss Lucia Kimball. Such a wedge in the counsels of this great international body will surely weaken the tough and stubborn resistance to temperance teaching in the Sunday school which has heretofore characterized the international lesson system. A new era is upon us—earnest faithful effort has its reward.

Miss Anna M. Edwards is proving herself "a boon" to the Wisconsin W. C. T. U. "God bless her" is the word that follows her and her work wherever it has been heard from.

"We must do what we can for own neighbors and leave the result to God," is the legend, taken from the pious Lacordaire, on the pretty program of the Providence (R. I.,) W. C. T. U. celebration of its tenth anniversary, a delightful occasion truly, if the performance equaled the promise.

It is recorded, so says Mrs. Hobart, state president of the Minnesota W. C. T. U., who never says that for which she has not reliable authority, that not one murder has occurred in Wyoming territory during the past year. This too in what is commonly supposed to be a land of outlawry. But then, as Mrs. Hobart also says, "women are a part of the government in Wyoming."

* * *

Could James Russell Lowell have written these words for a certain class of reformers in this day and generation?

"I'm willin' a man should go toll'able strong
Agin wrong in the abstract, for that kind o' wrong
Is allers unpop'lar and never gets pitied,
Because it's a crime no one never committed;
But he mustn't be hard on particular sins,
Coz then he'll be kickin' the people's own shins."

* * *

Mrs. Anna M. Martindale, state president of Delaware W. C. T. U. shares the itinerancy with one of God's ministers, shares it loyally and cheerfully, and so her new address is Dover, instead of Smyrna, her good husband being the newly appointed pastor of the M. E. church in the former place.

* * *

In a certain nameless locality, which however I keep in mind by name, expecting to rejoice with great joy some day over better things reported, the pastors of several evangelical churches after being asked by the W. C. T. U. to unite in a mass temperance meeting, united to say publicly in the town paper that their churches would never be closed for any union meeting except one for the worship of God," O temperantia! O mores!

* * *

Says one of the W. C. T. U. parishioners, "Well, we're not discouraged, even with this rebuff. We intend to have meetings as often as possible, and if we may not have for speaker one sitting in Moses' seat, to read and expound the law, there may be some humble carpenter who in this as in other regards may be a true follower of the lowly Jesus of Nazareth."

* * *

True it is that God "shuts in" His workers but carries on His work. Here is our Mrs. Barney superintending a vast and blessed National work in prisons and jails, that was prompted, in 1878, by Mrs. Col. Denny of Indiana, one of the leading workers of early days in W. C. T. U. history who has been an invalid "these many years." Her heart rejoices in the triumphs of God's mercy, even though she may not share the toil.

A rich contribution to the literature of "statesmanship" is the following from Senator Edmonds to a personal liberty meeting in Washington:

VICE PRESIDENT'S CHAMBER,
WASHINGTON, March 29, 1884.

SIR:—I have yours of the 21st inst. as also the previous one referred to. The pressure on my time is so great, in respect to matters that it is an absolute duty to attend to, that I was unable to respond to your kind invitation as I have been to your last note. It is quite impossible for me to address the meeting to which you refer and I have had no time to consider the questions suggested in your resolutions.

There are probably some respects in which wider means for rational and peaceful enjoyment of the Sabbath could be provided and then there are other respects probably in regard to which the welfare of the community, to which individual wishes and unlimited liberty must yield, would be subserved by legislation in a different direction, but, as I say, it is quite impossible for me to give time for the consideration of the subject.

Respectfully Yours, GEO. F. EDMONDS.

D. W. GLASSIE, ESQ.,
Chairman, etc., Washington, D. C.

"For those that like this sort o' thing, it's about the sort o' thing they'll like!"

After such "dawdling" one almost welcomes the plain speech of an Iowa congressman, Jere H. Murphy, who at this same gathering was introduced as "from the Egypt of temperance fanataeism," and who said:

I am ashamed to stand here tonight and say to you that her (Iowa's) legislative conduct in the last legislature would not only make hell ashamed, but it would absolutely turn darkness pale, etc.

The school board of the District of Columbia refuses to allow the children of the public schools to have an opportunity to sign the pledge, their parents permitting. We are accustomed to prohibitory legislatures but "it ees 'ard" to have school boards set up after this fashion.

* * *

Mrs. McClees proposes to ask all superintendents of work among soldiers and sailors to see that meetings are held on the evening of Decoration Day for the Grand Army of the Republic, also to send flowers with temperance cards attached to army posts and Soldier's Homes. Plenty of pansies I hope—"that's for thoughts"—and rosemary, for remembrance.

This is the way state Protective Associations levy on the innocent and unsuspecting for money to carry on their liquor war:

ALTON, Ill., March 10 1884.

DEAR SIR:—At a regular meeting of the Forty-first District Association of the State Protective Association of Illinois, held on the 7th day of March 1884, you were assessed as an ice dealer the sum of five dollars ($5.00) as a contribution to the funds of the State Protective Association of Illinois. You will please pay amount to Mr. Theodore Fries, treasurer of the Forty-first District Association on or before the 1st day of April 1884 and receive your certificate for the same. Respectfully yours,

FRANCIS BRANDSNIDE, Sec. Forty-first Dist. Ass'n.

Mrs. Ada H. Kepley, superintendent of Foreign Work in Illinois, has published a little manual of Foreign Work that will be invaluable to all workers in the state. Its tables of figures and facts are just what is needed to show forth the need of winning over to our side the ever augmenting "balance of power."

A pretty little white card flutters my way. It is entitled "The White Cross," and underneath the white cross is a little song for Reform Clubs, written by Chas. G. Howell, of Detroit.

ON DUTY.

News From the Field.

VERMONT.

Middlebury.—Rev. C. C. Frost, of Connecticut, was with us from April 20 to April 30, holding a series of gospel temperance meetings in our beautiful new town hall. The meetings were very successful as to numbers and interest. The financial results were very satisfactory. Many signed the pledge, and we hope much permanent good will result from these labors.

Mrs. M. A. Munroe.

SOUTH CAROLINA.

Spartansburg.—Our Y. W. C. T. U. is nearly a year old (organized August 1883) and we have a great deal to encourage us and inspire our zeal. Our membership is sixty-five, with an honorary membership of seventeen. Have recently rented a large room in which to hold our meetings, and with part of the proceeds of a festival, held in January, at which we cleared $87, we are furnishing it plainly but neatly.

The meetings are held twice a month; at them we have music and readings; have had several social gatherings at private houses. We have also had public lectures and intend to keep these up. Our Union owes much of its success to our esteemed superintendent who is untiring in her efforts in the cause.

Corresponding Secretary.

WEST VIRGINIA NOTES.

Malden.—A union was organized here April 21. Active work was at once entered upon in the shape of a petition to be signed by all the willing voters, women and minors of Malden district, requesting the commissioners to grant no more license in the said district to sell alcoholic drink inany form. Each of the members is to be presented with a copy of the petition, and the whole membership to be considered as a committee for the purpose of canvassing the whole district.

Elizabeth.—This new union starts out with a full corps of energetic workers, and they mean to be supplied with the best of ammunition, as The Freeman and The Union Signal were strongly recommended and subscriptions solicited.

TEXAS.

Sherman.—Through the earnest appeals of our brave worker, Miss Moore, our women were stirred to reorganize and we now have a membership of twenty. We have held weekly meetings and put in motion some departments of work, such as influencing the ministers to use unfermented wine, and the papers to give us a column for temperance, placing tin boxes in filled public places with temperance literature. The work in the jail has been blessed; we distribute flowers each week, praying that the scripture attached may lead some weary soul to Christ. Have subscribed for Jerry McAuley's paper to be sent to the jail, which I consider one of the best papers for that work. Last Thursday a co-laborer of my husband's went with us and preached the Word, the sisters prayed and sang. As we talked with the men afterwards we knew God's Spirit had been carrying home the truth. One of the prisoners handed me a piece of brown paper with some words written expressing his feelings:

A prisoner's heart was melted by the little bunch of flowers,
As he thought of home and mother in childhood's happy hours,
As through the woods he wandered in search of treasures sweet,
And plucked the lovely flowers that grew about his feet.

A sweet face came to our prison cell with flowers rich and rare,
And gave to each and every one a little bunch so fair.
Mayhap she thought of a mother in some far-off distant home,
Who with the Savior in silence knelt alone.

And as the leaden wings of time move slowly o'er us here,
With faces all unused to smiles and eyes unknown to tears,
The memory of those little gifts we hope will guide us on
To better lives and nobler deeds until life's race is run.

So we will move on as God opens the way. A large public school is being built; we shall pray and labor to introduce temperance instruction there. If a Band of Hope is not formed now we will labor in the Sunday schools. The extreme warm weather may prevent continuous labor, but I feel confident the work will now go forward. We shall hold a public gospel meeting in two weeks conducted by the ministers and hope to have one monthly.

M. E. Kinney.

PENNSYLVANIA.

PENNSYLVANIA NOTES.

Somerset county, Pa., organized its first auxiliary less than two years ago. Last week the ninth local union wheeled into line with a membership of 60.

Under a recent decision of the supreme court of Pennsylvania, distillers can open liquor stores in local option towns and retail poison by the gallon. In Waynesbury, Green county, and in the town of Washington, where no license has been granted for six years, the opening of these "distillery liquor stores," is creating unprecedented excitement and the most determined opposition.

Eighty-two new unions are reported in Pennsylvania for the present year, where a genuine W. C. T. U. revival is in progress.

Franklin.—Great success has attended our efforts in all the branches of W. C. T. U. work which we have attempted and we pride ourselves upon the fact that our union is fast learning to "know just how to work" for as all know, there is an education to be obtained in this as in all other work.

Our president, (who is also county president) has been very industrious and successful in organizing; and since November 29, has organized eight new unions.

On May 3, our president with other officers organized two unions one at Salina, in the afternoon, and one four miles distant, in the evening, at Victory.

At both of these places we were delighted to meet earnest and intelligent women whom we felt confident would do honor to the cause.

At Franklin we have a large pleasant reading room provided with all needed comforts, and the best and most popular literature. The evangelistic work of our union cannot be surpassed, for the Sunday afternoon meetings are as largely attended as any of the churches and there we always have the pledge and obtain signatures sometimes in large numbers. We at first held these meetings in our reading room but it soon became too small and they are now held in the court house.

The above with the interesting jail work which has proved a benefit to all those engaged in it and the prosperous Young Woman's work are to us signs of success.

We expect to hold our second county convention on the 14th and 15th of this month at Oil City.

Mrs. E. A. Richards, County Supt. Press Work.

KENTUCKY.

Lebanon.—We were organized by our efficient state president, Mrs. Geo. W. Bain, about fourteen months ago. The work accomplished in these short months seem almost incredible. We want you to understand the situation, "Our lines have fallen to us" at the "Hub" of the "Old Bourbon" producing district. Distillers are our neighbors, their interests are interwoven with ours in very many ways. Where we expected sympathy we have often gotten rebuffs. The crusade Pslam comes with the blest assurance "Happy is he that hath the God of Jacob for his help, whose hope is in the Lord his God."

We have now about seventy or eighty members, and a Band of Hope numbering sixty, have rented two commodious rooms, centrally located where we hold our weekly meetings, furnished with tables, chairs, book cases, organ, black board and pictures on the walls making a bright, cheerful hall to which we invite the public. Where once was a billiard hall with a saloon below stairs, there we have planted our banner for "God and home and native land." Last week the saloon keeper said he could not stand, or withstand those women, and moved out.

Our organization has been a financial success, having made five or six hundred dollars by lectures, teas, socials, lunches, etc. Every county court day we serve lunch, the proceeds of which is set aside to pay our rent. By degrees we are furnishing everything neccessary to prepare the lunch even to table cloths, dishes, buckets, etc.

Every evening the hall is open for those that wish to read, the library supplied with choice books, the daily papers, etc., trying in every way to combat those bright gilded halls of destruction, of which our town has, I think, twenty.

Some of our ministers enter heartily with us into the work, have had temperance sermons in every pulpit.

Temperance literature is distributed also through the community at large, hand bills posted, etc.

The Flower Mission committee is at work and we hope to do a good work this summer, visiting the poor as well as those in prison.

A brighter day is just before us in Kentucky we hope. Our lieutenant governor who is a strong temperance man and has lately canvassed the state, says if prohibition was put to the popular vote, it would carry by seventy-five thousand. That is encouraging. It is the Lord's own work and he will see to it that success crowns the hard fought battle. God speed the day is our prayer.

R. F. Latimer, Cor. Sec. W. C. T. U.
